CONDEMN CLAPP LAW

REPORT COMPLETED FOR HOUSE WILL RECOMMEND REPEAL OF AMENDMENT.

AFFECTING THE INDIANS

New Method of Dealing With White Earth—Removal of Restrictions for Certain Mixed Bloods Advised.

Washington.—Representative Miller has completed the report which the committee on Indian affairs will place before the house when it formally reports the Steenerson bill amending the Clapp amendment and making other important provisions concerning the land question on the White Earth reservation.

The report recounts in detail the circumstances leading up to the passage of the Clapp amendment and the unforeseen developments pursuant upon its enactment into law, whereby a majority of the Indians professed to be mixed bloods in order to sell their lands, and then professed to be full bloods in order to have the allotments restored to them.

The report says, in part:

"As a result, the department of justice has brought some suits to recover in all cases where fraud or injustice is thought to have occurred. Practically no new suits have been brought within the past year. Practically all the suits that should be brought have been brought.

Cloud on Many Titles.

"There are several thousand tracts of land which have passed into the hands of innocent purchasers and in respect to which the original grantors having received full compensation therefor, there is no controversy or complaint. The bringing of these suits, however, has thrown a cloud on all the titles of land in that region and in a large part of three counties there is now a deplorable condition. Taxes are no longer paid and the public schools to which most of the Indian children go, are without support.

"The progress of the region is at a halt. The welfare of the Indians can only be served by making property in that region valuable. The value of the Indian's land is depressed with the value of the white man's land in that region.

"Your committee, therefore, has deemed it wise to urge the department of justice to bring all possible suits at once, and to this end has given six months within which to do it. If the department desires, it can bring a suit affecting every tract of land within 30 days, but the committee has seen fit to extend the period to six months. There can be no reason why all cases cannot then be covered.

No Interference Proposed.

"The act here proposed does not interfere with the government's right to bring a case at any time in the future on the ground of fraud after the expiration of the six months. It is proposed to have patents issued as was contemplated and required by the Clapp amendment. This is simply carrying out the terms of the law covering rights that have been fixed and would not now be affected by statute.

"In order to avoid a repetition of the present deplorable condition and adequately protect the welfare and rights of the Indians, your committee has deemed it wise to change the existing law and accordingly have repealed, by section 4 of the proposed act, the so-called Clapp amendment. In place of the same, the first two sections of the bill provide that Indians having one-half or more of white blood shall have their restrictions removed. Those having less than three-quarters Indian blood and no more than one-half, have their restrictions removed as to 80 acres, leaving 80 acres as a homestead. Eighty acres is a large farm in a wooded country.

Conveyance Right Important.

"The right to convey surplus land to secure funds with which to improve the homestead is a right fundamentally important to the prosperity of an Indian allottee. Indians having three-fourths or more Indian blood have their restrictions retained as under the general law."

DR. HUNTER IS DROPPED.

Action Taken When Physician Fails to Fight Charges Made.

Minneapolis. — Doctor C. H. Hunter was dropped from the University sity of Minnesota medical faculty by President Vincent. The regents approved the president's action. President Vincent said that the reason for the dismissal of Dr. Hunter was that he had failed to file suit, as requested by the board, against a publication which the board regarded, has libelled him.

BOYS WOULDN'T PARADE

Duluth High School Students Not in Memorial Day Exercises.

Duluth. — But two boys out of six hundred at the Central high school voted to take part in the Memorial day parade, when requested to signify their willingness by raising their hands, and these two quickly withdrew their hands when they discovered that they were alone. The boys had just listened to addresses by some members of the militia.

BRYAN MAY GET MINNESOTA

STAMPEDE FOR NEBRASKAN IS POSSIBLE.

Wilson Has 362 Instructed Delegates To Champ Clark's 114.

St. Paul. — According to the Democratic county conventions hold throughout the state of Minnesota, followers of Jeffersonian principles in this state have declared themselves unequivocally for William Jennings Bryan as their choice for presidential candidate, so the Bryan men say, and they base their assertion by pointing to the tabulated results of these conventions, which show that although Woodrow Wilson adherents were in a position to swing almost every convention in the state they refused to instruct their delegates for Wilson, but instead sent them to the state convention unfettered. This action, Bryan men point out, leaves the Wilson men free to bolt to the Bryan standard, should it be raised at the Duluth convention.

There seems to be foundation for the report that the Wilson men really are anxious to support the Commoner, if the reports from the several districts are a criterion. Throughout the state as in Minneapolis, the Wilson adherents were careful to name Bryan men as their delegates to Duluth, and even the Clark men made no protest, so long as these men were known to be favorable to the candidacy of the Nebraskan if he can again be induced to run.

Some of the counties took an open stand for Bryan and giving the Nebraskan the uninstructed contingent, which is made up mostly of Wilson men, the Peerless leader can easily stampede the Duluth convention.

Throughout the state there was a noticeable effort to influence the Democratic state platform by injecting planks into the resolutions. Many counties expressed themselves in favor of a preferential primary law, corrupt practices act, direct election of United States senators, the recall, income tax and other measures and in one county the convention placed itself on record against the extra session of the state legislature called by Governor Eberhart, declaring it to be the sense of the convention that this call had been issued for its political effect.

According to the total representation in the Duluth convention as estimated from the returns, there will be 362 delegates on the floor who are pledged to support Wilson's candidacy, 114 instructed to vote for Champ Clark a nucleus of 34 who will do the rooting and preliminary work toward launching a Bryan boom, if such is possible, and 301 delegates unfettered, who will do all in their power to help the Bryanites if they deem such a course expedient.

CONVICTION IS UPHELD

Supreme Court Finds Against Dr. D. F. Dumas.

St. Paul, Minn.—Conviction of Dr. D. F. Dumas, former mayor of Cass Lake, on a charge of attempted arson, was upheld by the state supreme court in a decision handed down.

Dumas, who is now out on bail, will have to face the Beltrami district court for sentence. It was said that a special term of court might be called.

The Beltrami county physician was arrested last June after Mike Davis and Martin Behan, yeggmen, were surprised by detectives from the state fire marshal's department attempting to rob the safe and blow up a general store at Puposky, Minn. Davis escaped and Behan was caught. He turned state's evidence and declared Dr. Dumas was the originator of the plot.

Their testimony was to the effect that Dr. Dumas had approached R. E. Smith, owner of the store, some months previously and suggested to him an increase in his insurance and the employment of men who would burn the place under the guise of blowing the safe. A figure of $800 was named as the price for the work. This was to go to Dr. Dumas.

Road and State Clash.

Virginia.—The Mesaba electric railway, which is now being built, has its right-of-way into Virginia from the north surveyed over two forties of state land and proposes to erect its car barns on one of them. State Auditor Iverson is opposed to the trolley line promoters crossing state land, and especially to the plan of locating the car barns on the property. Part of the material is on the ground. If the case is not settled amicably, injunction proceedings will probably be commenced.

RAP EXTRA SESSION

DEVELOPMENT LEAGUE BOARD SAYS NO "EXTRAORDINARY OCCASION" EXISTS.

9 REASONS ARE GIVEN.

Desires Legislature Adjourn Immediately, or Enact Primary and Corrupt Practices Laws Only.

Mankato.—The executive board of the Southern Minnesota Better Development league, in session here passed resolutions condemning a special session of the Legislature, copies of which will be sent to state Senators and Representatives. It was the sense of the meeting that no "extraordinary occasion" for such a session exists, and the committee went on record as favoring an immediate adjournment of the lawmakers June 4, or at least their confining themselves to the enactment of a primary election law and a corrupt practices act, leaving reapportionment out of their deliberations. The board fears the unlimited power of Legislation granted by the call.

Twenty attended the meeting, and the resolutions were passed with only one dissenting vote. Four state senators were in the gathering. Thomas Cashman of Owatonna, Henry W. Benson of St. Peter, J. E. Haycraft of Madelia and O. A. Linde of Canby.

Session Unwise and Inexpedient.

The resolutions:

Resolved, that in the opinion of the Southern Minnesota Better Development league, expressed through its executive board, a special session of the legislature at this time is unwise and inexpedient, because, while the governor's call is for a primary law, a corrupt practice act and reapportionment, the legislature is not so limited.

Second—The call, without previous notice, was dated May 18 and for the session to convene June 4, 1912, not giving sufficient time for consideration or legislation.

Third—Primary legislation is new and requires the greatest care and a long time to get a perfect or satisfactory act.

Fourth—A year had passed since the legislature adjourned and no call was before made or expected among the people.

Fifth—Primaries already have been held this year, and the time is so near at hand for other conventions or primaries that there is neither sufficient time to make an adequate law, or for the people to become familiar with its provision so as to effectively or intelligently use the same this season.

Sixth—A new legislature will regularly meet in but a few months after the people shall have voted on amendments already submitted.

Seventh—There is a great danger that a law might be passed reapportioning the state, which at this time would render ineffective the seven senator amendment to be voted on at the next general election.

Embarrass State and People.

Eighth—In the very nature of things if the legislature attempts legislation there will be no limit to its subjects of work, and the legislature, the state and the people will be embarrassed and injured, rather than benefited, in the results that will inevitably follow.

Ninth—There is at this time no "extraordinary occasion," economically or otherwise, for a special session; on the contrary, there are "extraordinary" reasons why it should not be held.

Now, therefore, for the foregoing reasons and others too numerous to mention, be it

Resolved, that it is the sense of this league that the legislature will best subserve the interests of the state and the people, when it convenes, by immediately adjourning the session sine die without transaction of any business.

Resolved, further, that if such is not possible the legislature should limit itself to the enactment of the primary election law and a corrupt practice act.

Resolved, further, that a copy of these resolutions be sent to our state senator and representatives.

Embarrass State and People.

The committee also adopted a form of constitution and by-laws for the organization of the counties of the league, and plans for the meeting of the league in St. Peter June 26 were discussed.

SHOW BIG INCREASE

Carloads Receipts on Local Railroads Are 8 Per Cent Larger Than Year Ago.

St. Paul.—The carloads receipts of all railroads entering St. Paul, including the freight handled at the Minnesota Transfer, for the month of April, 1912, show an increase of more than 8 per cent over April, 1911, or a gain of 1,206 cars. The carloads forwarded for the month show an increase of slightly more than 1 per cent over a year ago, a fact which proves that the goods received here consumed in St. Paul more than ever before.

The total receipts for April, 1912 were 16,668 carloads against 15,382 carloads a year ago. The carloads forwarded totaled 13,132 for the month, against 12,968 a year ago.

Agricultural implements, 1912, 166, 1911, 66, increase 90 carloads; furniture, 1912, 110, 1911, 86, increase 24 carloads; lumber, 1912, 1,537, 1911, 1,110, increase 427 carloads; merchandise, 1912, 5,321, 1911, 4,708, increase 612 carloads; miscellaneous, 1912, 1,233, 1911, 1,011, increase 222 carloads.

Physicians Recommend Castoria

CASTORIA has met with pronounced favor on the part of physicians, pharmaceutical societies and medical authorities. It is used by physicians with results most gratifying. The extended use of Castoria is unquestionably the result of three facts: First—The indisputable evidence that it is harmless: Second—That it not only allays stomach pains and quiets the nerves, but assimilates the food: Third—It is an agreeable and perfect substitute for Castor Oil. It is absolutely safe. It does not contain any Opium, Morphine, or other narcotic and does not stupefy. It is unlike Soothing Syrups, Bateman's Drops, Godfrey's Cordial, etc. This is a good deal for a Medical Journal to say. Our duty, however, is to expose danger and record the means of advancing health. The day for poisoning innocent children through greed or ignorance ought to end. To our knowledge, Castoria is a remedy which produces composure and health, by regulating the system—not by stupefying it—and our readers are entitled to the information.—Hall's Journal of Health.

Letters from Prominent Physicians addressed to Chas. H. Fletcher.

Dr. B. Halstead Scott, of Chicago, Ills., says: "I have prescribed your Castoria often for infants during my practice, and find it very satisfactory."

Dr. William Belmont, of Cleveland, Ohio, says: "Your Castoria stands first in its class. In my thirty years of practice I can say I never have found anything that so filled the place."

Dr. J. H. Taft, of Brooklyn, N. Y., says: "I have used your Castoria and found it an excellent remedy in my household and private practice for many years. The formula is excellent."

Dr. R. J. Hamlen, of Detroit, Mich., says: "I prescribe your Castoria extensively, as I have never found anything to equal it for children's troubles. I am aware that there are imitations in the field, but I always see that my patients get Fletcher's."

Dr. Wm. J McCrann, of Omaha, Neb., says: "As the father of thirteen children I certainly know something about your great medicine, and aside from my own family experience I have in my years of practice found Castoria a popular and efficient remedy in almost every home."

Dr. J. R. Clausen, of Philadelphia, Pa., says: "The name that your Castoria has made for itself in the tens of thousands of homes blessed by the presence of children, scarcely needs to be supplemented by the endorsement of the medical profession, but I, for one, most heartily endorse it and believe it an excellent remedy."

Dr. R. M. Ward, of Kansas City, Mo., says: "Physicians generally do not prescribe proprietary preparations, but in the case of Castoria my experience, like that of many other physicians, has taught me to make an exception. I prescribe your Castoria in my practice because I have found it to be a thoroughly reliable remedy for children's complaints. Any physician who has raised a family, as I have, will join me in heartiest recommendation of Castoria."

Being a Baseball Star.

A star's job is a hard one. The mental strain is even greater than the physical. For what he undergoes the fabulous salaries are not fabulous.

Before going into details let us define a star—the ball player's definition:

"A star is any player who, through individual excellence, achieves a reputation for brilliant work, thus attracting fans to the park to see him play."

He is a star only so long as his performances stand out. He is paid the salary of a star as long as his reputation brings fans to the stands and money to the box office. The day that sees the waning of his sensationalism also sees the waning of his salary.—Edward Lyell Fox in Outing.

Repartee Off the Stage.

In the big Weber-Fields dressing room Joe Weber and George Beban sat tense over a game of checkers. "I'm working him up to his part," murmured Mr. Weber, in a kind voice. "He must go on the stage in a tantrum in a few minutes. Every night I beat him a game of checkers in here before his entrance. It has just the right effect on him." "Every night you don't beat me!" cried his opponent. "I owe you $1.90 in 12 weeks. Is that much?" "Not so much, but I'd be glad to get it," suggested the sweet-voiced Weber.

The Bible is Many Books.

There are few persons who understand the true origin and history of the Bible. As a matter of fact, the Bible is not one, but many books. The word is derived from the Greek Biblia, which means "books." In the same way we speak of the "Scriptures" or "writings," both in the plural.

In "The Scripture of Truth," a remarkably successful book by Sidney Collett, the author tells of the origin, history, symbols, alleged errors and contradictions in the Bible.

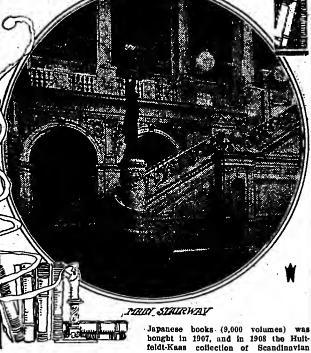
THE LIBRARY OF CONGRESS

LIBRARY OF CONGRESS

THE ROTUNDA READING ROOM



MAIN STAIRWAY

MR. HERBERT PUTNAM

TO ARRIVE at some understanding of the activities of the Library of Congress as an institution, a brief description of the building, which stands as a lasting monument to American genius in architecture, sculpture and art will be necessary.

The grounds adjoin those of the national Capitol, the outer walls having a frontage on four streets. The building is of the Italian renaissance order of architecture, has three stories covers an area of nearly four acres of ground, with four large inner courts 150 by 75 to 100 feet in size. It is lighted by about 2,000 windows. Its gilded dome, 195 feet high, terminates in a gilded finial representing the ever-burning torch of science.

In front of the main entrance and between the great stone stairways leading to the facade is the great semicircular basin representing the Court of Neptune—the classic god of the sea—whose huge bronze figure forms the center of a group of tritons, sea nymphs, sea horses, serpents and other marine animals and amphibious creatures. This fountain is said to be the most lavishly ornamented creation of its kind in this country.

The exterior of the building is not profusely decorated, but the very simplicity of its classic lines adds to the grandeur of its imposing appearance. The entrance pavilion has sixteen rounded pillars with Corinthian capitals. Four colossal atlantes support the pediment, in which are sculptured American eagles, with supporting figures of children. In the windows are nine great portrait-busts, in granite, of Emerson, Irving, Goethe, Franklin, Macaulay, Hawthorne, Scott, Demosthenes and Dante. The three deep arches of the pavilion terminate in the three massive bronze entrance doors, 14 feet high and 7½ feet wide, weighing 3½ tons each, which are beautiful works of art in themselves in their sculptured designs in relief, typifying Tradition, Writing and the art of Printing.

Beyond these doors is the main vestibule, separated from staircase hall by piers of Italian marble, ornamented with pilasters supporting marble arches, overhead being a paneled ceiling finished in white and gold, impressively rich and elegant in design. The gilded beams of the ceiling are supported by white and gold consoles, in front of each and almost detached from it stand out the sculptured figures, in pairs, of the goddess Minerva, one of War, and the other of Peace.

From this vestibule is entered the staircase hall, an apartment unsurpassed in magnificence and artistic beauty by any entrance hall in the world. It is truly "a vision in polished stone," with its vaulted ceiling 72 feet high, its sides lined throughout with fine Italian marble, highly polished, while on the sides rise pairs of magnificent marble columns with elaborately carved Corinthian capitals. Through the intervening spaces are seen glimpses of the rich coloring of the mural paintings and the glittering gold of the ceiling decorations of the vaulted arches and galleries of the second floor.

The grand double staircase with white marble balustrades, one on the north and the other on the south side of the hall, has probably no equal in the western hemisphere. The newel posts, richly decorated with festoons of flowers and leaves, are surmounted by two huge bronze figures of classically draped women holding aloft a cluster of electric lights. The staircases are highly ornamented with miniature marble figures carved in relief representing in emblematic sculpture the various arts and sciences. On the buttress of the south stairway are the sculptured figures representing America and Africa supporting between them a globe showing these continents, while on the north side a similar group represents Europe and Asia.

This spacious and magnificently decorated hall, taken in connection with the grand corridors and the elaborately and artistically embellished reading room, furnish the finest marble interior in America.

From the east corridor a stairway ascends to the balcony of the reading room. On the wall of the landing of this stairway is a beautiful mosaic of Minerva, the goddess of wisdom, by Elihu Vedder. Entering the visitors' gallery an excellent view is afforded of this spacious rotunda or main reading room. Its vastness is but dimly appreciable from the bare statement that it is 100 feet in diameter and 125 feet in height, and that the pillars are 40 feet high and the windows 32 feet wide. One of its chief beauties is the harmonious blending of the rich coloring effected by the dark Tennessee, the red Numidian and the yellow shades of Sienna marbles, accentuated by the old ivory of the stucco ornamentation of the dome. Upon the eight immense piers supporting the dome are placed female figures of colossal stature, above each being a quotation relative to the phase of learning or achievement further represented by the 16 bronze statues standing in the gallery, two in each of the great arches which encircle the room. In these statues Religion is represented by Moses and Saint Paul; Commerce by Columbus and Fulton; History by Herodotus and Gibbon; Art by Michael Angelo and Beethoven; Philosophy by Plato and Bacon; Poetry by Homer and Shakespeare; Law by Solon Kent; Science by Newton and Henry.

In the collar of the dome, which is 150 feet in circumference, is a symbolism of the twelve nations and epochs which have contributed to the advance of the world, each represented as a seated figure bearing the emblems suggestive of its peculiar attribute. Egypt represents Written Records; Judea, Religion; Greece, Philosophy; Rome, Administration; Islam, Physics; Middle Ages, Modern Languages; Italy, Fine Arts; Germany, Art of Printing; Spain, Discovery; England, Literature; France, Emancipation; and America, Science.

In the crown of the great lantern of the dome is painted The Human Understanding, an allegorical figure of a woman floating among the clouds and attended by two children genii.

The artistic mural decoration of the interior is upon a magnificent scale and the paintings in each of the many pavilions, corridors and galleries are so numerous that no attempt can be made in this article to give a description of them. Every artistic design has purpose and meaning in every stroke of the artist's brush, in every curve and line wrought by the sculptor's chisel. The completed building stands today as the highest expression of American art, the greatest monument yet erected to American genius.

The eight acres of floor space contained in the building are utilised as follows: On the ground floor are the copyright office, reading room for the blind, superintendent's and disbursing office, bookbinding department, printing department, music rooms, mail room, lockers, etc. The first floor contains the main reading room, the librarian's room, periodical reading room, senators' reading room, representatives' reading room, map and chart rooms, administration rooms. The second floor is taken up with the galleries, pavilions and rooms filled with exhibits of rare engravings, manuscripts, prints, rare books, first editions, portraits of the presidents and other celebrated personages. The attic floor contains a kitchen and restaurant, rooms for print repairs, manuscript repairs, photography documents and copyright storage.

In 1814 the library, consisting of about 3,000 volumes, was burned by the British troops. Congress made a fresh start by purchasing the Thomas Jefferson library of about 7,000 volumes, which grew until in 1851 it had about 55,000 volumes. Another fire then destroyed all but 20,000 of these. The country had grown so much in wealth by this time, however, that this was but a temporary check, and the library quarters in the Capitol were promptly restored and many of the books which had been destroyed were replaced. In 1867 the Peter Force collection of Americana, consisting of about 60,000 articles, was purchased for $110,000, and the acquisition in the same year of the library of the Smithsonian Institution, consisting of 40,000 volumes, brought the total up to over 200,000 volumes. The copyright law of 1848 required the deposit of one copy of each book copyrighted in the library, and an act was passed in 1870 which placed the registration of copyrights under the care of the librarian of congress, and required the deposit of two copies of each book or article copyrighted, thus assuring the acquisition of books published in the United States.

The rapid progress of the library dates from 1864, when Dr. A. R. Spofford was appointed librarian. His tireless energy and unflagging zeal increased the acquisitions until in 1897, the date of his retirement, it had grown to more than 1,000,000 books and pamphlets, and the necessity for more spacious quarters had been realised for some years. In 1886 the construction of a new building was authorised and eleven years later this was completed at a cost of $6,347,000, on a site bought for $585,000. This is the present home of the third largest library in the world. That the cost of this magnificent building was kept down to such a comparatively reasonable figure is explained by the fact that many of the artists and sculptors, in a spirit of patriotic loyalty, gave their genius and their art free of cost to the nation. It is said that twice the sum expended could not duplicate the building under ordinary circumstances.

As to the practical features of the institution, its capacity, facilities for serving the public, and its various activities, only a brief outline can be given. Including the main reading room, the room for periodicals, the senators' and representatives reading rooms, and the special reservations in the alcoves and galleries, the library can comfortably accommodate 1,000 readers at any one time.

The main reading room, which contains the issue desk, has seating capacity and desks for 200 readers and 60 tables in the alcoves and galleries, which are assigned to scholars making extended investigations. The issue desk is connected with the stacks, the Capitol, Smithsonian division and librarian's office by pneumatic tubes, while electric book carriers connect the desk with the stacks and with the Capitol.

When a book is called for at the desk the slip is sent by a pneumatic tube to the clerk in the proper stack. He places the book into a receptacle, from which it is taken by one of the brass book baskets, eighteen of which are mounted on an endless double chain forming the book carrier, which travels continually between the stacks and the issue desk. The basket carries the book down to the reading room and automatically deposits it into a cushioned box at the central desk, whence it is taken out by the attendant and delivered to the desk selected by the reader. The books can also be returned to the stacks in the same manner. If a member of congress desires a book delivered to him in the Capitol, the pneumatic tube carries the slip making the request to the issue desk and another electric book carrier conveys the book through an underground tunnel over a quarter of a mile in length and delivers it to the waiting statesman in about three minutes.

The book stacks, which radiate from the main reading room, consist of a series of cast-iron frames, supporting tiers and shelves to a height of nine and ten stories to the roof, the largest stack being 65 feet high. The shelves, of cold-rolled steel, are polished smooth, and since the addition of the last stack have a capacity of about 3,000,000 volumes. The ultimate capacity, when other stacks are added, will be over 4,000,000 volumes—a row of books which would extend over 100 miles.

According to the report of Mr. Herbert Putnam, the librarian, just submitted to congress, the contents of the library at present are:

Maps and charts (pieces)	123,568
Music (volumes and pieces)	557,010
Manuscripts (a numerical statement not feasible).

The library proper is strongest in bibliography, public documents (especially those of foreign governments), Americana, economics, political science, public law and legislation, genealogy and newspapers. Through the Smithsonian institution extensive files of transactions of foreign learned societies are received. By virtue of the copyright law it has received the most complete collection in existence of the products of the American press. American local history and biography are represented with unusual fullness. The Yudin collection of some 80,000 volumes of Russian works, purchased in 1907, is particularly valuable for the history of Russia and Siberia. A collection of Japanese books (9,000 volumes) was bought in 1907, and in 1908 the Huitfeldt-Kaas collection of Scandinavian literature of about 5,000 volumes. Orientalia is further represented by the Weber library of Sanskrit literature (3,018 volumes, 1,002 pamphlets). The library has bought recently large numbers of the monumenta of European history, and is rapidly growing in the sciences, pure and applied.

The administrative officers of the library are the librarian, chief assistant librarian, chief clerk and secretary. The superintendent of the building and grounds, with his aids, has entire charge of the maintenance of the building and makes all disbursements for the library.

The library force, consisting of about 500 persons, is organized into divisions, each with a chief and assistants. The following constitute the principal divisions: Mail and delivery, order, printing office and bindery, catalogue, card distribution, bibliography, periodicals, documents, manuscripts, maps and charts, prints, law library and copyright office.

FIG GATHERING IN ITALY.

The season for gathering the figs in Italy joins hands in October with the vintage; but it really begins in August, owing to a curious system of culture.

Early in August the fig gatherers squirm through the twisting branches from tree top to tree top and "oil the fruit." These fig people are nomadic; they appear and disappear like the wandering harvesters of France. Late in July the masserie are rented to them, a stated sum being paid to the proprietor, a payment that gives to the fig gatherers the right to all the fruit, beginning with the figs and ending with the last cluster of grapes.

Rude huts thatched with straw are built by the proprietor of all his orchards, and in these the gypsylike harvesters live with their families. Sometimes they supplement their narrow quarters with a ragged tent. Three sticks placed crosswise and a kettle in the crotch constitute the kitchen.

Shortly after their arrival the work of forcing the fruit is begun. The methods employed are curious. In one a wad of cotton is dipped in olive oil and gently rubbed on the flower end of the fig. Fig by fig is thus treated, and in eight days the fruit is ready for the market.

Another method consists in gathering in the spring the half formed fruit, which is strung on ropes. These ropes or garlands are thrown over the branches of the tree and are allowed to decay under the burning sun. There is born of this decay an insect that pierces the growing fig and induces rapid maturity.

The fig, when perfectly ripe, exudes a drop of honey sweet juice at the nether end, which never falls but hangs there, a standing temptation to children and to bees. When fresh picked at this stage the fig has a rich flavor entirely lost in the dried fruit.

HONGKONG CUSTOMS

Chinese Women Perform as Heavy Labor as the Men.

They Haul Huge Loads, Harnessed Up Like Horses, Also Assist in Building New Roads—City is Very Cosmopolitan.

Hong Kong, China.—A peculiarity of the Hong Kong colony is the anomaly of the men's and women's occupations—according to our English ideas. The women work just like the men; they drag huge loads harnessed like horses, carry heavy weights strung over their shoulders as yokels carry milk cans in the country.

They stagger up the Peak for about 100 yards, when they lay down their burden, go back, pick a new lot up, carry this up to the first dumping place, then take the first load on a few yards further and so on, all under a blazing sun. All the bricklaying, road mending, coaling, etc., is done equally by both sexes, but perhaps the most curious sight, writes a Hongkong correspondent, is to see a woman straining at an oar or at the steerage of a sampan.

If the boat be a very heavy one two of the women will work an oar together, one pulling one way and the other pushing, while a little baby is perched on the back of each in a sort of cradle or papoose arrangement.

On the other hand up on the Peak, which is the European settlement, one often sees a Chinese boy walking along sedately pushing a perambulator, while the English nursemaid walks empty handed by his side and superintends operations. Of course all the house work is done by "boys."

The next point is the very cosmopolitan nature of the place. This was most forcibly borne in upon me the other day when I was walking with an American on one side and an Australian on the other. Just in front of us were a couple of Germans, a Parsee stood at the door of his shop, a Japanese girl followed by two Portuguese boys passed us, and a moment later a ricksha went by in which sat a Spanish maiden.

There were of course Chinese scattered all over the place as usual, so that here within a hundred yards of one another at least nine nationalities were represented. It would be hard to name a country which could not produce its type here.

A contingent of the Baluchistan infantry is here; we have Sikh policemen; Indians of all kinds are represented officially in the civil and police courts; next to the "Chinks" I think the Germans predominate; there is a large sprinkling of Malays and Lascars, heaps of Frenchmen and Swedes; Italians, Turks, Portuguese and Spaniards all have their place in the colony; the Scotsman and Irishman are here in large numbers, and then somewhere at the end of the list come a few straggling Englishmen.

FATHER IN A GLASS CASE

Paris.—Viverios, in Auverne, boasts of a man who for twenty-five years has preserved his father's body in a glass case in his drawing room.

Jean Granet, who has just retired at the age of 70 from his post as secretary to the local mayor, keeps a museum at his house, in which are found mummies, animal and human, and grim curios connected with the undertaking business. The most gruesome exhibit, however, is the perfectly preserved body of his father, Robert Granet.

To all who pay a franc the son will disclose his father's body, explaining the minutest changes that have occurred.

In order to surmount a legal difficulty Granet, whose house abuts on the local cemetery, had a small mausoleum constructed on the consecrated ground and connected by a passage with his museum.

Tales of GOTHAM and other CITIES

Chinese Wife "Alla Samee 'Melican"

NEW YORK.—Quon Shee Fee, fair as the golden lily of the Hoang-Ho, dainty as the purple plum that ripens under tea house eaves at Canton, has skipped from her golden nest at 9 Pell street, and there remain to mourn her Lou Fee, her lord, Mouchock, her white poodle, and Tee-lee, the yellow canary by the window.

Quon Shee Fee flew into a rage the other night, hurled her husband's supper out of the window, beat her husband's cousin, Lou Pon, over the head with a heavy fan, and then went out into the dark of Pell street to lose herself from the sight of her outraged lord and master. All Chinatown hummed for days with the scandal.

"She make-ee d-suffiagette business alla-time," was the way Lou Poo, the abused cousin, explained the flight of Quon Shee Fee.

"Alla-time she mak-ee lead-um 'bout de-suffiagette. Alla-time tink-um 'bont fool woman lita business. Woman alla-samee husband, she say. Woman got fo' have good time likee husband—got fo' stiay out eoght—got fo' makee de-good tima. Woman no stiay home, she say."

And there you have it—the suffragette invasion of Chinatown.

Lou Fee, who is more prosperous than the average of his fellows, through the profitable tea business that he conducts at 9 Pell street, began to hear faint rumbles of trouble the other morning; so he told Lieutenant Burke of the Elizabeth street station. He had been out playing dominoes the night before and had not come home until after midnight.

There had been a fine row; this much Lou Fee admitted. His spouse had declared flatly that if he was going to stay out all hours of the night playing dominoes or fan-tan with the other Four Brothers boys, he need not expect to find a wife waiting for him at home.

But Lou Fee, who is high in the councils of the Four Brothers, the implacable enemies of the On Leong Tong, told his wife very properly—by Chinese standards, at least—to keep her mouth shut. He would stay out as late as he pleased. So yesterday when dinner time, at 7 o'clock, the lord of this suffragette spitfire was not at home to partake of his evening shark's fin.

But Cousin Lou Pon was and he got what was designed for the husband.

Get More Milk by Serenading Cows

SPOKANE.—Practical dairymen and veterinarians and animal psychologists in the Spokane district and throughout eastern Washington are agreed that the theory advanced by Josiah Grant of Wisconsin to increase the milk supply by the introduction of dreamy waltz music in the cow stables is reasonably logical and worthy of serious consideration.

Mrs. Joseph Rudersdorf, acting president of the Spokane Humane society, is confident the theory is correct, saying: "Music affects and soothes every animal or human being. Loud music would cause an animal to be nervous, while soft music, which would soothe the nerves of the cow, would naturally increase the milk production."

Dr. Otto Minig of the veterinary staff of the State of Washington college, who conducted experiments along similar lines while preparing a work on animal psychology, said the man who ridiculed the Grant idea is merely betraying his ignorance.

"That idea is not to be treated lightly," said Dr. Minig. "Anything that soothes the nerves aids in the milk production."

Dr. Walter Baker, also a member of the staff, recalled an experiment where a dog secretes more saliva while eating as music is being played, and indorses the plan.

"I am inclined to think there may be more than a grain of truth in the reasoning, but I would not want Sousa with his brass band to amuse my cows. I believe violin music would get better results. In other words, I would prefer Kubelik to Sousa to entertain our cows at milking time."

Jelly Juggler Puts Coppers to Rout

With officers in front of him, officers behind him, and officers circling all around him, Frank Eingang, whose home is thought to be at 165 Grant street, hurled jars of jelly and other canned condiments at his assailants the other day. The latter were trying to capture his fort, which consisted of the cellar of the residence of Mrs. Henry W. Oliver, at 845 Ridge avenue.

Sergeant of Police James Rea and Wagonmen James Sherry and Philip Mall were the besiegers of "Jelly Fort."

Eingang entered the cellar through a window which he smashed with a brick. Before entering he relieved himself of all his garments. Neighbors telephoned the police. In a few minutes the battle was on. First one policeman and then another, in their advance on the besieged, felt missiles whiz past their heads and smash with a juicy crash against the wall. Try as they might, they could not reach the jelly javelin thrower.

After an inglorious retreat and a palaver as to the best means of obtaining the surrender of the fort they returned to the attack, only to be met with a different defense. Eingang had discarded his jelly jars and assumed a mallet. This he swung about his head. When his attention was attracted by revolver shots the three officers pounced upon him.

Lambs Are Slaughtered as Sacrifice

TOLEDO, O.—When a number of East side residents saw several men and women gathered about some bleating lambs they held before them, they thought little of it. But when they suddenly saw one of the men insert a knife in the neck of a lamb they were amazed. They crowded closer and saw these same men hold the dying lamb while men and woman stood about reverently, muttering sounds taken to be prayers.

All this appeared strange to those who watched, and one of them, who was angered at the slaughter of the lambs on the open lot in the residential district, called the police.

When the motor cops arrived they found the watchers of the lambs surrounded by many other residents of the East side. The man who slaughtered the first lamb cut the throat of another. The live lambs stood near by.

The police learned that the lambs were being slaughtered by a [illegible] of Bulgarians, members of the Greek Catholic church, who had begun the observance of the feast of spring. The proper observance of this custom, it was learned, was for the sacrifice of four lambs annually. After the lambs were killed the carcasses were piled upon a fire and roasted, the meat of which was devoured by members of the church as fulfilling their part of the sacrifice.

After the slaughter of the second lamb the remaining two were taken to a vacant house nearby, where they met the fate of the others. These also were roasted upon the fire [illegible]

WHO'S WHO —and Why

SUGGESTED AS VICE-REINE

When the first Irish parliament since the dawning of the nineteenth century assembled in the "Old House at College Green," Dublin, where the eloquence of Grattan and Flood stirred the Europe of their time, an American woman may stand at the throne, listening to her titled husband reading the king's speech inaugurating home rule in Ireland. This great day, so soon to come, is the talk of town and country in the British isles.

The question that has rocked the politics of the three kingdoms to the foundations of political life has ceased to be political. Its social side is what now appeals most rapturously to volatile Ireland and gay, dashing, fun loving Dublin.

Two women are most prominently spoken of as the likeliest to lead the new regime as vice-reine of Ireland. The first is Consuela, duchess of Marlborough, the self separated mistress of Blenheim palace, which the English people gave to "Ian" Churchill for his victories in protection of the "low countries." The duchess would make a most dignified, queenly hostess. Only one circumstance seems to bar the way between her and the dream which she has cherished when the Marlborough marriage was made—her domestic estrangement. This, however, appears to be drawing to a welcome close.

Queen Mary has expressed her desire that the duke and duchess should forgive, forget, and begin all over again. And it is hinted that if the proud Consuela consents to be pacified, the vice regal coronet will grace her brow.

PAYS HOMAGE TO A SERVANT

On the eve of his departure for the land of the heather and thistle, the Laird of Skibo bade farewell to one of his servants who had been in the service for 23 years. The occasion was made a gala one in the servants' hall at the Fifth avenue mansion, New York, the Carnegie family participating in the function and being no small part of it.

Skibo castle will be minus its head house maid in the person of Miss Maggie Anderson. In giving her [illegible] years in service, Miss Anderson developed some of the thrift for which the iron master is famous, and announced some time since she was going to open a public house in Edinburgh. That is her home town, but the only living member of her family is a brother out in San Francisco. She planned to pay the brother a visit, and the laird presented her with a round trip ticket to the metropolis of the Pacific coast. This was not all he did. He presented her with a handsome gold watch and a life pension of $500 a year. In the servants' hall were gathered all the help of the big mansion at eight o'clock. The haughty Jeems of the upper hall condescended to lend his dignity to the occasion and beamed on simple Sandy from the stables. The house maid fraternized with the cook, the butler with the groom. It was a truly harmonious family gathering.

THE "FIRST LADY OF LONDON"

By the election of her husband to the important position of chairman of London county council, Lady Cheylesmore, an American woman, becomes in a sense the "First Lady of London." The county council, of course, is the real governing body of the greater city, and the position of chairman corresponds in a general way to that of mayor of a city like New York, the so-called lord mayor of London "ruling" over only the old city of London—about a square mile in area.

Furthermore, Lord Cheylesmore himself is half American. His mother was Charlotte Harman of New Orleans and he is a living example of the advantage of wedding the hustling, practical qualities of the American with the liberal conservative qualities of the best English aristocracy. Lady Cheylesmore, who was Elizabeth French, daughter of F. O. French of New York, has become one of the most popular and respected women in English society. She is tall and handsome, and possesses that dignity which is so highly valued in this country.

NEW QUEEN TO BRING GAIETY

Alexandrine, the new queen of Denmark, promises to delight her subjects. Queen Louise lived austerely, despite her great wealth (more than $15,000,000), and the French blood in her veins that come from the Bernadotte line to which she belonged. It is said of her that she never attended a theatrical performance or a ball. Queen Alexandrine is far more pleasure-loving, and the court, when the period of mourning has passed, may well be expected to take on a gaiety it has not shown for some years. The queen is a sister of the crown princess of Germany. Their mother is Grandduchess Anastasia, a shining light in society on the Riviera, whose liveliness and unconventionality sometimes make Emperor William nervous.

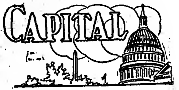
NATIONAL CAPITAL AFFAIRS



Officers Show How Army Does Baking

WASHINGTON.—Improvements in present-day methods of baking bread in the field for the army over the methods of only a year or two ago were seen in a demonstration at the Washington barracks the other day, before a delegation of officials from the war department. Those present were Gen. Henry G. Sharp, commissary general of the United States army; Col. David L. Brainard and Maj. Henry G. Cole.

No housewife or French chef could have turned out a better dinner or whiter, brown-crusted bread than did the cooks in the open air with their "take-down" ovens, in the opinion of the watchers.

Roast beef, that sent up a savory odor, onion gravy that tempted the palate, and strawberry shortcake, covered with delicious icing, were only a few of the things which were on the bill of fare. Capt. M. A. Elliott, Jr., who is in charge of the bakery at the barracks and who conducted the inspection, assured his visitors that no "frills" had been added for the occasion, but that it was an ordinary noonday meal.

The bakery at the barracks is known as field bakery No. 1, and comprises one-third of the entire cooking staff of the United States army. It has facilities for cooking for 19,000 men, although only about one-third of the facilities were in use. The corps there includes one officer and 65 men. This section also is a school for those who wish to become army cooks.

The demonstration included the use of the older clay ovens and the kind used in the Civil war, and down to the present day type, which can be knocked down in a few minutes ready for transportation in the army wagons.

In the school where the men are taught to cook are hung charts showing food values. Besides this there is an equipment of experimental apparatus, including an electrical oven, used in teaching them the scientific as well as the practical points in cooking.

Finds Huts Upon a Lonely Island

QUIDNUNCS at Washington, those gentlemen who are always asking, "What now?" enjoyed a considerable thrill of mystery and curiosity in discussing the recent report of Rear Admiral Southland, who on board the West Virginia visited Palmyra Island and 51 of lesser isles, lying about 1,000 miles southwest of Honolulu, about 90 miles from Fanning island.

The Palmyra group, says Chapple's News Letter, was proclaimed a part of Hawaii in 1882, but since it has appeared to the state department only recently that Great Britain had annexed them in 1889, Rear Admiral Southland was dispatched with the West Virginia to explore the group thoroughly. No living person was found in the archipelago, although bird life abounded.

The most mysterious find was a little settlement of three huts in a densely wooded slope of Islet 51, the presence of which was thoroughly screened from anything by the closest search. Two of the huts were roofed with corrugated iron and one with thatch, and there were stoves, tables, shelves, jars, bottles and other evidences of a continued occupation at no very distant period. One hut, with a new door and good lock, contained a large number of cedar cases of Oriental make, several of which had been labeled by pasting a slip of Japanese paper on the ends and writing over it. One case was thus labeled: "This case contains ammunition, May 7."

While there is no harbor at which a vessel might coal or a naval base be permanently established, the group could be used for the accumulation of supplies or the rendezvous of an expedition intended to carry out a design dependent on secrecy.

Human "Goat" in Postal Department

A HUMAN "goat" was discovered the other day in the postoffice department. No, it was not Postmaster General Hitchcock.

John R. Rhoades is employed in the supply division of the department. It is the principal duty of Rhoades to nail together the large boxes filled with postal supplies for postmasters in every section of the country.

As is customary with those who are engaged in a similar task, Rhoades took up a mouthful of wire nails. By some unforeseen circumstances one of the nails escaped his fingers when it was about to be pulled from his mouth, and went down his throat.

He was choked for an instant. Then some of his co-workers called up an ambulance. They thought he would choke to death unless medical aid was rendered at once. The ambulance from the Providence hospital arrived and Rhoades was hurried to the institution. The physicians at Providence were especially busy when Rhoades arrived. He waited for half an hour. No one came to his assistance.

"I can't afford to wait any longer," declared Rhoades. "I will be docked if I stay away from the department any longer."

He left the hospital and returned to his work. The nail was still clinging to some part of his internal anatomy.

"How does it feel to have swallowed a nail?" Rhoades was asked.

"Well, I have swallowed many a fish bone, and I don't feel any other sensation than that created by taking into my system one of the small bones of a shad," he replied. "I can breathe all right, and feel absolutely no inconvenience, but I would like to have this nail removed."

Electrician Fries Eggs by Wireless

ELECTRICAL discharges of hundreds of volts, an electric globe burning without any wire connection, egg frying by wireless, wireless telephony and telegraphy, and other electrical phenomena, and also wonders of liquid air, were demonstrated in a lecture by Professor L. H. Wood and Henry L. Transtrom, an electrical expert, at the Washington Foreign Mission seminary.

The electrical discharges were seen flashing in long specterlike streams, which snapped and crackled like lightning. By changing the terminals, the flashes resembled small electric fountains. Mr. Transtrom, holding his hand near one of the terminals, received into his body a current of at least 200,000 volts without any injury.

A wonder to the audience was the frying of the egg without any visible power, but there was heard the sizzling and the low hum of the transmitter which was not connected with the pan. Two hundred of the audience heard through the receiver of the wireless telephone a voice that came from the transmitter in another part of the building.

The auditorium being darkened while wireless telegraphy was demonstrated, it was illuminated by the brilliancy of the discharges, the noise of which was deafening. The lighting of a common incandescent globe by wireless followed. A hollow copper ball floating in a jar of water was rotated with great rapidity; and a heavy copper ring was suspended in midair, and then thrown upward several feet, also by wireless.

Professor Wood is a teacher of science in the seminary and Mr. Transtrom a student. Mr. Transtrom has constructed much wonderful electrical apparatus.

TUBERCULOSIS OPEN-AIR CURE.

The great war against the "white plague" has had marked results, chiefly through the employment of out-of-door treatment. While it is only comparatively recent that this treatment has become general, it has been advocated for over twenty-five years right here in Philadelphia, and many persons who suffer from consumption and are taking the "home treatment" sleep in tents or inclosed porches, says the Philadelphia Capital. Benjamin Franklin, in his numerous researches, learned many elemental truths, which he handed down to posterity in his writings. He declared that disease does not come from pure or cold air, but from draughts and the uneven exposure of the person to icy blasts. It is his theory which is in a large measure responsible for the present method of treating pneumonia patients at the Jefferson hospital. The ward on the roof is an innovation and is largely in the nature of an experiment. Its permanency will be decided by the number of cures effected. So far the proportion of recoveries has been so great and the fatalities so small that the physicians in charge hesitate to give out the figures, lest they be thought to be exaggerating. This is especially encouraging, because of the unusual fatal course so many cases of pneumonia have taken this winter.

Young men who have completed the courses of study prescribed in the University of Wisconsin's College of Agriculture are in demand at good salaries, according to the statistics of the college, says the Chicago Record-Herald. When the university closed in 1911 the demand for agricultural graduates could not be supplied and all the members of the year's class had found places at salaries ranging from $600 to $3,000 a year. Places that would have paid $450,000 in salaries could not be filled because of the lack of qualified men. This showing is an indication of the change that is coming generally in agricultural methods. Rule-of-thumb, haphazard methods will not do on the farm any more than in the well-managed factory. There must be truly scientific farming, the combination of sound principles with the results of experience. Evidently the owners of farms see the change at hand and are eager to avail themselves of the knowledge possessed by the Wisconsin graduates.

"The law does not permit a man to leave his wife just because she nags him," Justice Marean decides. He meant, of course, the law of this state, says the New York Mail. In Kentucky, Missouri and other states, "ungovernable temper" and "indignities" are a cause not only for separation, but for absolute divorce, and nagging may certainly be carried to the point of indignity; while in Oregon one may obtain a divorce if the partner of one's joys, and especially of one's sorrows, "makes life burdensome." And what can be more burdensome than nagging? However, there ought not to be divorce, nor even separation, for nagging, because no court of justice can ever be sure that the nagging is not justified, or at least provoked. Some women, for instance, are born naggers. Some achieve nagging. And a considerable number of others have nagging thrust upon them by a course of conduct which may be outwardly courteous, but which in its essence is insupportably irritating.

The Chinese republic has decided to revise its language and has engaged Prof. Solong Hello, who teaches Japanese and Chinese in the Royal institute at Naples, to provide them a new alphabet. A Massachusetts woman wants married men tagged by registered buttons on their coat lapels. This is another link in the chain of subjection which is being forged for the so-called stronger sex, whose rights and privileges are fast diminishing to things of shreds and patches.

Brussels, Belgium, June 7.—King Albert and Queen Elizabeth had planned to leave for Ostend for a stay at the royal villa on the seacoast, but the journey was abandoned because of the political situation resulting from the socialist resentment of the clerical victory in the elections.

CONTROL 100 IN GOTHAM

New York, June 8.—The policies of nearly one hundred of the biggest banks and other financial institutions in New York are directed outright by six men.

The five first named constitute the membership of the clearing house committee, that all powerful organization, the New York Clearing House association. It is the controlling body of the clearing house. Mr. Hepburn is a member of the committee ex-officio by reason of his being president of the clearing house association.

This committee directs only in name. Behind its members stand the small group of financial giants who constitute the money trust, now under investigation by the committee on banking and currency of the national house of representatives. Among them are J. Pierpont Morgan, Thomas F. Ryan, the Standard Oil interests and George F. Baker.

Under examination by Chief Counsel Samuel Untermyer, William Sherer, for 20 years manager of the clearing house, made admissions upon which the foregoing assertions are based, in New York on Thursday before the congressional subcommittee. E. H. Farrar, associate counsel, sat between Chairman Arsen Pujo of Louisiana and Mr. Untermyer.

The New York clearing house is a law unto itself. There is no legal check on its great and extraordinary powers. It actually issues gold and silver certificates in imitation of the paper currency of the country which is used by the members of the association practically to increase the circulating medium. In times of panic it issues clearing house certificates at will to brace up the credit of its members, or such of them as it pleases, and other financial institutions that may not be members.

Before the taking of testimony was begun Chairman Pujo read a statement prepared by the committee and counsel in executive session at the Plaza hotel, asserting that after hearings as to the operations of the New York clearing house and stock exchange have been concluded in this city next week, the committee will adjourn until fall. The reason assigned for this determination was two-fold. The committee perceived it to be not desirable to carry on the investigation in the "heat and excitement of a presidential campaign." It also deems it unadvisable to test its inquisitorial powers too far until the amendatory legislation passed by the house and now being held up in the senate shall have been enacted into law and signed by the president.

BURNS IS DENOUNCED

DETECTIVE IS ACCUSED OF HOUNDING WITNESSES.

Cross-Examination of Bert H. Franklin Ends—Prosecutor Denies He Seeks to Involve Gompers.

Los Angeles, Cal., June 8.—Cross-examination of Bert H. Franklin, in the trial of Clarence S. Darrow, accused of bribing jurors in the McNamara case, was concluded on Thursday, he having been on the stand for ten days. He testified that it was in the office of Oscar Lawler, special prosecutor for the government in the dynamite conspiracy investigation, and in his presence that he (Franklin) made his first confession of guilt.

He also said that he had first been approached with a view to getting him to turn state's evidence by a deputy United States marshal and that later he had applied for employment to the Merchants and Manufacturers' association, which took a prominent part in the McNamara prosecution.

In his attack on Burns, Rogers accused the prosecution of trying to strike at Samuel Gompers, president of the American Federation of Labor, and declared one of the Burns detectives, who had been in attendance at every session of the trial, had sought to reach the ears of a juror with remarks made while seated in the section occupied by members of the press.

The district attorney insisted that Burns had nothing to do with the prosecution and that no one sought to implicate Gompers in the Darrow trial.

"Burns' men are concerned in every detail of this case," retorted Rogers, "even to hounding our witnesses and watching our office and dictagraphing our pieces. No man could truthfully say that William J. Burns' men employed by the National Erectors' association were not behind this case in every particular."

A WONDERFUL DISCOVERY.
This is the age of research and experiment, when all nature, so to speak, is ransacked by the scientific for the comfort and happiness of men. Science has indeed made giant strides during the past century, and among the—by no means least important—discoveries in medicine comes that of Therapion, which has, we understand, been used with great success in the French Hospitals and that it is worthy the attention of those who suffer from kidney, bladder or nervous diseases, chronic weaknesses, ulcers, skin eruptions, piles, &c., we think there is no doubt. In fact it seems evident from the big stir created amongst specialists, that THERAPION is destined to cast into oblivion all those questionable remedies that were formerly the sole reliance of medical men. It is of course impossible to tell sufferers all we should like to tell them in this short article, but those who are interested and would like to know more about this remedy that has effected so many—we might almost say—miraculous cures, have only to send addressed envelope for FREE book to Dr. Le Clerc Med. Co., Haverstock Road, Hampstead, London, Eng. and decide for themselves whether The New French Remedy, "THERAPION," is what they require and which they may have been seeking in vain during a life of untold misery, suffering, ill health and unhappiness.

Miss Addie's Hero

By Arthur Stapleton

(Copyright, 1912, by Associated Literary Press.)

Miss Addie Burrows had shifted out of short frocks into long, and the braids that once hung down her back were there no longer. She was a young lady now, a tall and willowy young lady who must climb trees at night if she climbed at all.

Miss Addie was not lean enough to cause her to answer the "Get Fat" advertisements, nor yet fat enough to wish to reduce her weight thirty pounds in one week. She was a nice sweet girl, and growing sweeter every day.

Has a nice, sweet young lady any moral or legal right to have a prejudice against anything or anybody? Miss Addie had one. She didn't tell it to everybody, but she talked with herself about it very often. That prejudice was against sawed-off men, both young and old. She could stand red hair or cock eyes or turn-in toes, but when it came to a man five feet two inches high strutting around with his chest thrown out she looked the other way.

It was no use for the father to say that Napoleon was a sawed-off man, or the mother to announce that Alexander the Great could hardly squint over a fence five feet high. This was a new era in the world around her, and short men should either have grown to giants or dwindled to dwarfs. As for Miss Addie herself, she measured five feet six, and paid no attention whatever to those who protested that Venus was an inch less in height.

Miss Addie had an invitation to spend a month with her particular chum, Miss Harmon, at the all-the-year-round country residence of the latter's mother, and she accepted without delay. Brother Bob was to be home on his vacation.

Brother Bob was just of age, and a civil engineer, or soon to be one, and he was both smart and lovely. There were other brothers in the world, but no other Brother Bobs. Girls land their brothers and try to make matches and don't succeed once in fifty times.

Sent That Weary Willie Into Dreamland.

Miss Addie liked smart men. If she could have come across anyone who had ever met Shakespeare or one of the Wright brothers she would have begged them to talk all day. She had been hearing of Bob Harmon for the last two years, and now she was to see him alive. He would be tall and have a professional look about him, and when she wandered arm in arm with him across the meadows, farmers driving past would stop their teams to stand up in their wagons to whisper:

"Gosh all hemlock, but can you beat that!"

As Miss Addie left the train at the country station she saw her friend Miss Molly waiting in an auto for her. Approaching her with a grin on his face to see about her baggage was someone else. He was what some folks meanly refer to as "a runt of a man," but referred to by others of more feeling as a sawed-off human. Yes, nature had put the saw to him and shortened him down to a bit over five feet. He was the only one in the world in ignorance of the fact. There were days and days when he felt himself an inch or two too tall. He had once walked for a mile behind a man five feet two and pitied him at every step.

"Oh, howdy do, Mr. Harmon?"

Brother Bob drove the car. He had to reach up to grasp the wheel. One looking from the rear seat to see if he were there had doubts about it.

"Bob and I are so glad!" gushed Miss Molly after the car got started.

"Ye-es?"

"Aren't you glad, too?"

"Of course."

"I was telling him yesterday that when you two sit side by side on the veranda and the autos go by it will be poor me."

Miss Addie had a mental picture of brother Bob sitting there with his feet six inches above the floor, and laughed. She also recovered her speech and began to tell how happy she was. As a matter of fact, she had no business to be either astonished or disappointed. If brother Bob and the rest of the world were suited she had no objection.

The young man laid himself out to be nice and succeeded. After three or four days his sawed-offness didn't look so sawed. By thinking of a man seven feet high all the time the girl managed to make herself believe that Bob was at least five feet six. Love him., Marry him? Never while water flowed and clocks ticked! Nice Bob, what there was of him, but there was only about half enough.

On the fifth day of her visit, and while Miss Molly was taking her music lesson, the visitor strolled down the highway. Brother Bob would have strolled with her, but she dodged him. The first he knew of her absence was when he heard her scream and ran into the road to see a husky tramp holding her by the arm.

The sawed-off man made about fourteen jumps and sent that Weary Willie into dreamland by a blow on the chin; knocked him out as neatly as Jeffries could have done, and didn't brag about it, either. He explained that it was a little way he had, and let it go at that.

As soon as Miss Addie got over her scare she looked long at brother Bob and finally made up her mind that he must be at least five feet eight. She also found herself almost believing that a sawed-off had a right to live as well as a giant.

Three more days passed and then the trio went fishing in the lake. Three persons are not too many to fish from the same skiff if one of them does not catch a little sunfish weighing about an ounce and jump around and upset the craft. That's what happened. Miss Molly could swim, and she headed away for shore, but Miss Addie went down like a bag of sand, and it was the sawed-off hero who dived and brought her up and clung to the boat until his sister brought another to the rescue.

"Oh, I don't know," replied Bob an hour later when thanked. "I just happened to be on the spot, you see. Having such long legs, I'm a natural swimmer!"

Long legs! Miss Addie smiled. Then she became serious. Was she near-sighted? Was Bob Harmon entitled to be called "long legs" instead of "duck legs?" It might be. At any rate, she measured him with her eye and decided that he had grown an inch in the last 24 hours.

It was in the middle of the third week that the climax came. The three were out in the auto when they encountered an automobile with two young men riding in it. They were heard from some distance singing a ribald song. As they drew nearer they became more boisterous, and seeing two girls and a small boy in the other machine they halted theirs in a narrow spot and blocked the way.

"What is it?" asked Bob Harmon as he stood up.

"Don't be scared, Bub—no one is going to bite you," was answered.

"But you are obstructing the road."

"Yes, Bubby, yes, but we want to sing you a song. Will the young ladies kindly join in the chorus, please?"

"My soul, but don't raise a row here!" exclaimed Bob's sister as he dropped out of the auto.

"Mr. Harmon—Bob—please don't!" added Miss Addie.

The men roared with laughter as Bob advanced upon them, and when he had quite reached their auto they jumped down thinking to play ball with him. The girls couldn't see it at all on account of the dust that was kicked up, but when the air cleared one of the men was running away and the other lying prone. They were a licked pair. Their automobile was backed away and left in the ditch, and all the sawed-off man had to say about it was:

"There are times when you simply have to do it."

That night Miss Addie did a lot of thinking. It was mostly about short men and heroes and Napoleons. She had come to a conclusion about the time the roosters began crowing. When she had reached home after her visit and told her mother all, the mother musingly queried:

"So you are engaged to a sawed-off man after all you've had to say about them?"

"Yes, mother, Bob isn't so very tall, but I'm going to learn to bend over so that when we walk out we will be the very same height."

Keep Yourself of the World.

Shame on the man of cultivated taste who permits refinement to develop into a fastidiousness that unfits him for doing the rough work of a workaday world. Among the free peoples who govern themselves there is only a small field of usefulness open for the man of cloistered life who shrink from contact with their fellows. Still less room is there for those who deride or slight what is done by those who actually bear the brunt of the day; nor yet for those others who always profess that they would like to take action if only the conditions of life were not what they actually are.—Exchange.

They have a very strong drink on the order of tapui, which they bring forth on all occasions, and the etiquette of the country requires that one should take a drink. The continual invitation to drink this "cong-cong" is the most disagreeable part of the trip through their country.—Manila Times.

WILSON THE WINNER

LYNCH IS RE-ELECTED

A National Committeeman.—Lengthy Resolutions Adopted.—Complete List of the Delegates Selected.

Duluth.—An attempted Bryan stampede which ended in a fizzle, but which served to prove that the gathering was really a Bryan convention, came at the close of the Democratic state convention.

The impending contest over delegates-at-large, which would have ended in defeat for Dan W. Lawler of St. Paul, was stopped when Mr. Lawler himself took the floor and moved the unanimous election of the six other candidates who had just been presented. In like manner the fight over national committeeman was called off, and Bert Fesler of Duluth, in behalf of T. T. Hudson, who had been contesting for the honor with Fred B. Lynch, seconded the resolution indorsing Mr. Lynch for re-election.

The Lynch indorsement was presented by Chairman R. T. Daly of the resolutions committee in a separate resolution, commending the faithful services of F. B. Lynch as national committeeman, and instructing the delegates to the Baltimore convention to vote for him for national committeeman. This was immediately seconded by Bert Fesler of Duluth, T. T. Hudson's lieutenant, and carried with a whoop.

Lengthy resolutions were adopted, embracing the Democratic doctrine as at present advocated by the party at large and particularly by Mr. Bryan. Gov. Johnson's memory was praised, Bryan was lauded, the Payne-Aldrich bill condemned, the Democratic congress praised, direct senatorial elections endorsed, ship subsidy condemned and the customary references made to the trusts, conservation and other live topics. Gov. Wilson's candidacy was heartily endorsed and the delegates instructed for him under the unit rule.

Owatonna. — The decomposed body of Clarence Shadbolt, 11 years old, an inmate of the State Public school in this city, who has been missing since the afternoon of May 30, was found in a ditch about a mile west of here by some section men. The body had apparently been in the water for several days.

Phone Company Loses Decision.

St. Paul. — The heretofore unquestioned right to telephone companies to enter private property and street boulevards to set poles and string wires received a setback when the supreme court handed down a decision holding the Northwestern Telephone Exchange Company liable for injuries inflicted on Marjorie A. Souther when she was attempting to prevent a force of men from planting a pole on the boulevard in front of her house. She had won a decision for $700 damages in the lower court.

HOIDALE'S HAT IN RING

Einar Hoidale.

Einar Hoidale, a Minneapolis lawyer, has filed on the Democratic ticket as a candidate for congress from the Fifth district. Mr. Hoidale was a candidate in 1910, but was defeated at the primaries by Thomas Dwyer, the "dinner-pail" candidate.

RIVER PLANS FAULTY

Engineer Hoyt Says Reservoirs Could Not Be Built to Prevent Floods.

St. Paul.—The building of storage reservoirs on the Minnesota river to avert the floods which in many years do serious damage to crops and buildings along the river, is declared impractical in the May report of W. G. Hoyt, district engineer of the United States geological survey, a copy of which was filed with George Ralph, state drainage engineer.

"In the southern part of the state at least," says the report, "it is doubtful if storage reservoirs could be so operated that they would be of value both as a means of flood prevention and to increase the low water flow. The streams of this section of the state are extremely flashy and floods are caused to a greater extent from long rains than from melting snow. It would therefore be necessary to empty the reservoir as soon as the peak of the flood was passed in order to control the next one. The above is on the assumption that there would not be sufficient storage capacity to take care of more than one flood at a time."

Mr. Hoyt also says all that saved the territory adjoining the Mississippi river in Minnesota from St. Paul south from experiencing one of the most disastrous floods known in its history, was the unusual circumstance that, while rivers in the northern part of the state were at a very high state, the Minnesota river was way below normal stage. The Minnesota was flowing only 7,000 second-feet maximum, while it often flows over 35,000 second-feet.

In order to make these floods impossible in future, Mr. Hoyt recommends the building of reservoirs on the Elk, Rum, Crow Wing and Sauk rivers in northern Minnesota. These reservoirs, while controlling the floods, would also produce abundant water-power. This would also help reduce the danger of floods on the lower Mississippi, which Mr. Hoyt declares can be controlled satisfactorily only by the erection of reservoirs on the streams running into the Mississippi from the north, augmented by the erection of dikes on the Mississippi. The erection of dikes alone would not be satisfactory and the nation would lose the returns from the water power which would be developed by the reservoirs.

DUMAS SENTENCE IN JULY

Says if Sent to Prison He "Will Take Medicine Like a Man."

Bemidji. — Dr. Delbert F. Dumas, former mayor of Cass Lake, whose conviction on a charge of attempted arson, was last week upheld by the state supreme court will not be sent to Stillwater to begin his prison term until July 8. Judge W. S. McClenahan before whom Dr. Dumas was tried and convicted last October told E. E. McDonald special county attorney who assisted in the prosecution of Dr. Dumas that he plans to call a special session of the Beltrami district court for the purpose of imposing sentence on the Cass Lake physician.

It also becomes known that Judge Marshall A. Spooner who with A. A. Andrews of this city and Freeman P. Lane of Minneapolis, conducted the defense of Dr. Dumas has completely withdrawn from the case and Geo. Spear of the Grand Rapids law firm of Spear & Stone is now looking after the interests of Dr. Dumas. Dr. Dumas is at liberty on bail bond totaling $22,000. He was here and admitted that he did not know what his next move would be but still hopes to avoid being sent to Stillwater. He said, "If the worst comes to the worst I will take my medicine like a man."

BACKS OFF THE BANK

Man and Woman Hurt When Car Crowds Team.

Brainard.—Crowded off the 25-foot embankment near the bridge at the powerhouse at Deerwood by a seven-passenger touring car, Charles Blomen and his wife were dashed to the ground below when their horse backed to get out of the way of the car. Blomen's skull was fractured and his wife is severely injured. The road is narrow at that point.

SONGALAGET AT OWATONNA

TWO THOUSAND NORWEGIAN VISITORS ON FIRST DAY.

Outdoor Program of Song and Story Held in Mineral Spring Park.

Owatonna. — Amid bands playing, flags waving and choruses singing the national songs of America and Norway, the big songalaget opened its first day of real work and pleasure combined and the city has all the gala day appearance of a Roman holiday.

Automobiles met the guests and escorted them to their rooming places and the hotels were gaily decorated. Every man and woman in the city wears the Norwegian colors and caps and the business section is a mass of waving pennants and flags. Albert Lea sent a special train with 300 delegates. There are nearly two thousand now in the city and more are coming.

The big banquet was held in the National Guard armory and tables were arranged for five hundred. The women of Norway served and amidst jollification and merriment the banquet was held. Norwegian songs were sung and folk lore stories were told.

At Mineral Springs park an out of door festival of song and music was held and the sons and daughters of Sogn made merry while thousands of visitors from the city and surrounding country joined in the celebration and paid homage to the descendants of the Northmen.

O. E. Williamson introduced Mayor S. R. Nelson who spoke briefly and welcomed the guests. R. N. Nelson of Madison, Wis., then spoke. The speeches were made by Rev. Urnes of Osage, Iowa; L. C. Grundeland, of Chicago; S. S. Tvelt, of Albert Lea, and Prof. A. A. Veblin, of Stillwater. The greeting "Er Du Sognlog" is heard on every side. Thursday was a day of music and festive sports in honor of Norway and its sons.

Minnesota had of course, the largest contingent present, but Iowa and Wisconsin were not far behind in their number of delegates, while North and South Dakota have a large quota. The society was organized in 1908 and is confined to Scandinavians who come from Sogn, Norway, or their descendants. Meetings of the society have previously been held in Minneapolis, Madison, Wis. Albert Lea and Sioux Falls, S. D.

Dr. Joakimo Arneson of Minneapolis spoke during the convention, delivering an illustrated lecture in the form of a travelogue. Some of the most prominent Scandinavian vocalists in the country will be present during the sessions of the songalaget and will take part in the program which will for the greater part be a grand festival of song and music.

Sognalagat Officers Named.

Owatonna, — Officers for the Norwegian Sognalaget for the ensuing year were chosen as follows: President foreman, Rev. Vrness of Osage, Ia.; vice foreman, B. R. Hopperstad of Albert Lea; treasurer, J. J. Hovi of Hayward; secretary, Prof. Reunie of Sioux City; corresponding secretary, John Dyherik of Oxfordville, Wis.; historian, Prof. G. Blom of Urbana; directors, J. B. Thompson of Albert Lea, B. N. Nelson of Madison, Wis.; Secretary O. E. Williamson declined re-election.

ACCEPTS JOINT OFFER.

Rochester to Employ Health Official, State to Pay Part of Salary.

Rochester.—The city council has accepted the offer of the State Board of Health and the women of the Civic league to employ a permanent health officer for one year, the State Board of Health to pay $1,000 and the Civic league and the city $1,000 each to defray the expenses of the health department.

A few weeks ago the state board made its offer of $1,000, and the Civic league offered to assume the entire responsibility of the balance of the expense if the city would appoint a health officer to be named by the state board. The proposition was rejected by the council. In the face of an impending epidemic shortly after Dr. C. H. Mayo was appointed health officer and a member of the Mayo staff has given his entire time to the health work—a practical demonstration of what a health officer can do in an impending crisis.

The offer of the state board having been turned down by other cities in the state, again was offered to Rochester, although the city must now stand $1,000 of the financial burden. A public health officer will be engaged as an assistant to Dr. C. H. Mayo, who continues as health officer, and the entire time of the assistant will be devoted to health matters. The result of his work will be used in bringing pressure to bear upon the next legislature to offer state aid to any city or community which will engage a specialist on public health as a permanent health officer.

St. Paul.—State Insurance Commissioner Preus has notified D. M. Lynch, general agent of the Pennsylvania Mutual Life Insurance company, at Fargo, N. D., that his broker's license in this state has been cancelled. The check sent by Lynch to pay for the license was returned on account of insufficient funds.

HOW GIRLS MAY AVOID PERIODIC PAINS

The Experience of Two Girls Here Related For The Benefit of Others.

Rochester, N. Y.—"I have a daughter 18 years old who has always been very healthy until recently when she complained of dizziness and cramps every month, so bad that I would have to keep her home from school and put her to bed to get relief.

"After giving her only two bottles of Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound she is now enjoying the best of health. I cannot praise your Compound too highly. I want every good mother to read what your medicine has done for my child."—Mrs. RICHARD N. DUNHAM, 311 Exchange St., Rochester, N.Y.

Stoutsville, Ohio.—"I suffered from headaches, backache and was very irregular. A friend advised me to take Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound, and before I had taken the whole of two bottles I found relief. I am only sixteen years old, but I have better health than for two or three years. I cannot express my thanks for what Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound has done for me. I had taken other medicines but did not find relief."—Miss CORA B. FOSNAUGH, Stoutsville, Ohio, R.F.D., No. 1.

Hundreds of such letters from mothers expressing their gratitude for what Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound has accomplished for their daughters have been received by the Lydia E. Pinkham Medicine Company, Lynn, Mass.

The Condensed Product.

"Oh, auntie, can I go to the fancy dress ball as a milkmaid?"

"No, darling; you're too small."

"Well, then, can I go as a condensed milkmaid?"

Piecing Out.

"Writing a story?" the caller asked the busy author.

"Yes; in dialect."

"I didn't think you ever made use of dialect."

"I don't, as a rule, but I have to now. Several letters are broken on my typewriter."

Post Toasties

THE SUNBEAM.

BY W. G. HUNT

There is now plenty of water in Red Lake River and it is steadily rising notwithstanding there has been no rain to raise it since it was shut off last summer by the lumber companys. Major Skunk should make an other scientific report to the government to account for this. Get there you representatives of the corporations and earn your hire, for men of your ilk will be hunting an other job after the 4th, of next March, at which time old Taft will go out of business.

Washington D.C. May 31, 1912.

P. V. Collins, Northwestern Agriculturist, Minneapolis Minn.

Presented Petition for repeal of reciprocity treaty, with thirty-one thousand names, one-eigth of a mile long, in the House today. Animated debate followed.

H. STEENERSON.

This was one of the largest petitions ever presented to Congress and our Congressman Steenerson is entitled to the credit of its introduction. It takes some courage to present a petition of this kind to repeal a pet measure of President Taft, but Steenerson is always looking after the interests of the farmers of his district regardless of the frowns of the moneyed interests and when he gets into a Campaign the farmers look after his interests with as much care and attention as he does theirs in Congress.

If the people of Pennington County are in any way indebted to Governor Eberhart they had better ask him to present his bill and make settlement at once. It would be a disgrace to this county that depend on the prosperity of its farmers to support a man for Governor of this big northern state of Minnesota who said: "I am sorry that Canada did not ratify the reciprocity treaty passed by Taft." The great Ignatius Donnelly once said: "A man is a fool that will pay a man for kicking him, and the world is better off for every fool that is dead." It don't make any difference what kind of a nomination there is made for governor whether primary or by convention the interests of the farmers of this County Demand Opposition to the re-election of Eberhart.

Went Over The Dump.

Senator Gamble went down to defeat in South dakota at the primaries Tuesday, and it is a significant fact that he is the 11th United States senator who supported Lorimer to fall by the wayside. is there no significance in this? Gamble, and a great many other United States senators who have fought for Lorimer, did so knowing their constitnents were opposed to Lorimer methods.

It make no difference to the people whether Lorimer was personally responsiable for some of the crooked work done or not, the fact that his supporters resorted to methods that were slimy reflects upon him just the same, and the people do not want United States senators or any other officials who are to serve the people, elected in that manner. Men elected that way are regarded with suspicion, whether or not they are personally involved in the crooked work done.—Crookston Times.

This was only another case of the people knocking out the [illegible] pigions set up by the corporations and trusts, and [illegible] Taft for the [illegible] will be cut over [illegible]

BETRAY[illegible] HIS DISTRICT

HANSON VOTES TO NOT LEGISLATE HIMSELF OUT OF OFFICE.

When we make a prediction, as to a mans qualifications for public office it is always a sourse of satisfaction to us to have the prediction of THE SUNBEAM come true, as it has in the case of Senator Hanson. Of him the Bemidji Sentinal says: "Right off the bat—in the very first inning, 55 Senators signed a rock ribbed agreement not to consider any legislation that did not bear on the enactment of a statewide primary bill or a corrupt practices act. Senator Hanson of Ada, Norman county, representing the Sixty-first district in which Beltrami county is included, was one of these signers.

The agreement or resolution in restraint of legislation, takes strangle hold on reappointment, an increased gross earnings tax and throttles all but two of the progressive measures proposed to be enacted during the session. Unless the Senate recedes from its position the House is gagged. Bills originating in it will be sent across to the upper branch of the Legislature and promptly and effecitvely smothered."

Hanson slipped into that office on the popular wave of "County Option," gaining his strength in the outlying parts of the district where the people did not know him. But he did not catch us in his net as we got "next" to him on his pork barrel deal, when the cities got the pork and the farmers of his district could not get a smell of the brine. He is a smooth old politicinn that cares about as much about county option as the devil does about holy water, and when he voted to strangle any attempt to get reapportionment he represented the whisky trust, as they are opposed to any reapportionment bill being passed. A fine duck you sent down there to represent the interests of this district! Again we say, we told you so

Woe Is His.

First.—My wife is my boss. I shall not deny.

Second.—She maketh me to lie down behind the bed, when swell company comes, and she leadeth me behind her up Main street.

Third.—She restoreth my pocketbook after she has spent all of its contents for stylish skirts and theater tickets, and she leadeth me up the main aisle at church for her new hat's sake.

Fourth.—Yea, though I walk more than half the night through dark rooms with a crying baby I will get no rest for she is behind me; her broomstick and her hatpin they do everything else but comfort me.

Fifth.—She prepareth a cold snack for me, then maketh a bee line for an old society supper. She anointeth my head with the rolling pin occasionally. My arms runneth over with the bundles before she is half done with her shopping.

Sixth.—Surely her dressmaker's and milliner's bills shall follow me all the days of her life, and I will dwell in the house of my wife forever.—Urich (Mo.) Herald.

Dr. Miles' Heart Remedy

cured Mrs. C. C. Gokey, of a stubborn case of heart disease, such as thousands are now suffering with. Read what she says:

"Before I began taking Dr. Miles' Heart Remedy I had been suffering from heart trouble for over five years. I had grown so weak that it was impossible for me to do thirty minutes work in a whole day. I suffered intense pains in my left side and under the left shoulder blade, I could not sleep on the left side, and was so short of breath that I thought I should never be able to take a full breath again. The least excitement would bring on the most distressing palpitation. I had scarcely taken a half bottle of the Heart Remedy before I could see a marked change in my condition. I began to sleep well, had a good appetite, and improved so rapidly that when I had taken six bottles I was completely cured.

Mr. LaConnt who homesteaded the vacant 80 of swamp land on sec 1 In Mayfield is up making preperatinns to build this week.

The farmers of Deer-Park township have been devoting their attention to stock raising but this year the acrage of cultivated land in that township will be doubled.

Walter McAndress is improving his farm residence by the addition of a couple of porches. Abe Bost is doing the cement foundation work and K. Kratzer the carpenter work.

Next week the question will be decided who is to be thenext nominee of the Republican party for president. If it is Taft he will never get any higher honor than the nomination, as he is due to get out of there next March.

It was a God send to the settlers living along the banks of Red Lake River that there was not a heavy rain storm at the time the lumber companys turned Red Lake loose onto them, for if there had been any rain there would have been thousands of dollars worth of crops distroyed.

Two three weeks old pigs, that we had bought and penned up made their escape Wednesday and swam across the Red Lake River. We captured one of them on the other side of the river, but the other one was lost in the brush. In about an hour he returned home having swam the river back again. We have often heard it said that a hog could not swim but these pigs seemed to be experts.

If we had as much water in the Red Lake River last winter as there is now there would have been no complaint made about the lumber companys closing it off. But it is now proven that it was closed off, and that our game and fish commission of this state and that engineers outfit at St. Paul were the tools of the lumber companys and a disgrace to the men who appointed them to their position.

There was a very good game of base ball played between the Lillo club and Mud Hens of Erie on Sunday last, in the pasture of Mr. Gizelquist in the afternoon which was a well contested game, the score being 5 to 5, at the close of the eighth inning. We did not learn the final score, as we left for home before the close of the game. All the boys acted the part of gentlemen and abided by the decisions of the umpire, which added to the pleasure of a large number of spectators present.

The logs are now moving down the river a steady stream and it is to be hoped that the lumber companys will get their jam out of the Red Lake River this year, and not run the risk of putting another one in there again, as they are likely to loose the servises of old Major Shunk next year, who they have leaned upon with the same confidence that a sleeping child would lay on the breast of a wet nurse, in their devilish operations of damming up and shutting off this river. We will fight their right to close up the river as long as we can raise a pencil, or a stick of type and with an honorable engineers office at St. Paul they are likely to get orders to open it.

The County Distric school officers are called to meet at the Court house in Thief River Falls on Saturday June 22nd, at 11 o'clock a.m. A good program has been prepared for this meeting and as many school officers as can do so should attend. C G. Schulz, State Superintendent of schools will be present to make an address to the school officers. School officers are paid by their districts for one days attendace and mileage, and they should attend and get what information they can about conducting rural schools.

JULIUS A. SCHMAHL,

A Leap Year Plunge

By Nellie Cravey Gillmore

(Copyright, 1912, by Associated Literary Press.)

Little Margery Sessoms's eyes were more pink than blue as she dabbed them petulantly with a very moist scrap of cambric and lifted her small, determined chin with a sudden accession of pride. Her mind was made up; she had shed her last tear for him. And in order to convince herself that she meant what she said, she opened Dwight Ogden's voluminous letter and read it through to the very end without so much as the quiver of an eyelash. Her lips tightened as she came to the final paragraph:

"I am sure the day will come when you will regret your obstinate course. You have vowed a thousand times that you loved me—not alone with your lips, but with your eyes—which is more. I know it; you know it. We both understand fully that there can never be any other man or any other woman, in just the same way. Our love was a sacred thing. It stands in a place by itself, high above the everyday counterfeit that people feed themselves—and fool—themselves on.

"We've proved it, haven't we? I am saying all this to you in self-justification; in justice to yourself. In after years it will be something to look back upon—as an exoneration—should my silly conscience begin to prod me for what I've never, intentionally, done. But, of course, after your merciless words of Tuesday night, it would be foolhardy—ridiculous of me—to reopen the subject to you. I have been given to understand. And as long as I live I shall never again annoy you with my feelings. I have asked you to marry me for the last time."

Margery folded the letter and placed it calmly in the envelope. Then she leaned forward in her chair and coolly laid it on the bed of pink and gray coals smoldering in the grate. She watched it in Spartan silence as the flame licked up and gathered it hungrily beneath its yellow tongue. When the last bit of charred paper had sifted to nothingness she arose, poked the coals with an elaborate display of unconcern and weakly trilling a bar from an old opera, quitted the room and ran upstairs to her den. Her lips and her cheeks were very white as she sat down before her easel. The unfinished study—a plate of June apples—was before her. She worked absorbingly for two solid hours; then with a sigh she laid down her brushes and threw back her head to survey the result. She laughed hysterically. The fruit was perfect in proportion, charmingly arranged; the leaves were absolutely lifelike and exquisite. But the apples were purple!

She Watched It With Spartan Silence.

Dwight Ogden took up the receiver with eager fingers. All day he had waited in a fever of hope and fear to hear Margery's voice. But blank disappointment met him. As before—a dozen times, perhaps—it was only a call from one of his patients, and he found himself wishing savagely that they were all dead—or well.

But the days came and went and drifted into weeks, and there was no variation to the story. His disappointment turned into despair. She had, then, meant what she said—they could never be more than friends, just because they happened to be cousins! Well, if she still persisted in her mulish course, he could do likewise. If she was willing to sit passively and allow the prejudiced views of a fanatic to prevail over the deepest feelings of her heart, he was quite sure he could carry out his end of the bargain to the bitter end. After the things she had said to him, it should be as he had stated in his letter, he had asked her to reconsider and marry him for the last time.

There came a time when young Dr. Ogden forgot his own identity for many weary weeks. Stricken down with [illegible] he raved in [illegible] the pretty little nurse had [illegible]

The [illegible] came [illegible] was despaired of. The [illegible] took it upon herself [illegible] Margery Sessoms. She had gotten her name from the sick man's ravings; she found her address in the telephone book. But alas! Margery was a thousand miles from New York. She was down south, in Georgia, nursing her mother back to health—and trying to patch up her own broken heart with her art.

It was a month later that, returning to her northern home, Margery found the letter addressed in a strange woman's handwriting. They had carelessly neglected to forward it, and as Margery's stupefied senses at last took in the full realization of the words, she gave a little husky cry and—swooned. They brought her to in a little while, and she again took up the letter and slowly re-read the contents:

"Dear Miss Sessoms—If you can, please come to the hospital right away. I am writing you on my own responsibility. Poor, young Dr. Ogden is dying, and he talks about you all the time—some trouble between you and I know you'd come if you could hear him.

"Ask for Miss Trueheart when you get to the hospital. Hastily,

"LYDIA T."

But Dwight Ogden did not die after all. He came slowly back to health and strength—and a shattered life. He had been so near relief from it all, and relief had not come. The same bleak future stretched before him only, if possible, it was bleaker. The little nurse had told him of her letter to Margery—and Margery's failure to respond. What was there left for him to live for? Not even hope!

Margery's trembling hand sought her throat! she felt as if she were going to stifle. Her heart plunged downward a thousand leagues. Dwight dead—and she had not been able to go to him. He had died believing her cruel and unforgiving and relentless! When she could pull herself together she arose and dragged her aching limbs to the telephone. She called up the hospital and asked for Miss Trueheart. Miss Trueheart was "on duty," and she falteringly inquired of the girl at the phone when Dr. Ogden had died.

"Oh," she gasped, "not—not dead. Getting well—ah! Thank you so much; I was misinformed. Goodby." Margery never knew how she got out the words—or how she got back to her room. The first thing of which she was conscious was of sitting before her desk, pen in hand.

"Dear Dwight.

"I have just returned from Macon, Ga., after a six weeks' visit. On my arrival at the house I found a letter from the girl who nursed you, Miss Trueheart, telling me of your serious illness. It was written the day you were expected to die and she asked me to come. You understand now why I did not.

"Dear, can you ever forgive me? I have been narrow, prejudiced, mean. But I have suffered. You don't know the price I've paid. Dwight—all these wretched weeks and today when I thought I had lost you.

"There's nothing I can write, nothing I can say, to excuse myself. And I'm not going to try. After the way I acted and talked that last night, of course you could never ask me to marry you again. But—but it is leap year, dear, and I am going to ask you. My people are getting ready to sail for Paris in ten days. I can be ready—for the other—in a week. As in the old days.

"Margery."

"P. S.—After all, we are only second cousins."

Few Lines Above Signature, However, Made the Souvenir Rather a Costly One.

A favorite amusement of society in Victorian days, says Lady Dorothy Nevill, was the bazar. Many great ladies became expert in the art of wheedling visitors into paying generous sums for useless articles. However, the victim of "brigandage" named by Lady Dorothy—in "Under Five Reigns"—himself invited disaster, and was, besides, quite able to afford it.

One of the most ingenious stratagems ever employed at a bazar was probably that devised by the famous writer, George Sand, when holding a stall at a charitable sale in favor of distressed Poles.

Baron James de Rothschild happening to pass, the fair saleswoman addressed him with the usual request to purchase something.

"What can I buy?" asked the baron. "You have nothing that I can do anything with. But stay! an idea strikes me. Give me your autograph. Sell me that."

Mme. Sand promptly took a sheet of paper and wrote: "Received from Baron James de Rothschild the sum of 1,000 francs for the benefit of the distressed Poles. George Sand."

M. de Rothschild read it, thanked her and, presenting a note for the sum mentioned, passed on with the autograph.—Youth's Companion.

BURNING DAYLIGHT

SYNOPSIS.

Elam Harnish, known all through Alaska as "Burning Daylight," celebrates his 30th birthday with a crowd of miners at the Circle City Tivoli. The dance leads to heavy gambling, in which over $100,000 is staked. Harnish loses his money and his mine but wins the mail contract. He starts on his mail trip with dogs and sledge, telling his friends that he will be in the big Yukon gold strike at the start. Burning Daylight makes a sensationally rapid run across country with the mail, appears at the Tivoli and is now ready to join his friends in a dash to the new gold fields. Deciding that gold will be found in the up-river district Harnish buys two tons of flour, which he declares will be worth its weight in gold, but when he arrives with his flour he finds the big flat desolate. A comrade discovers gold and Daylight reaps a rich harvest. He goes to Dawson, becomes the most prominent figure in the Klondike and defeats a combination of capitalists in a vast mining deal. He returns to civilization, and, amid the bewildering complications of high finance, Daylight finds that he has been led to invest his eleven millions in a manipulated scheme. He goes to New York, and confronting his disloyal partners with a revolver, he threatens to kill them if his money is not returned. They are cowed, return their stealings and Harnish goes back to San Francisco where he meets his fate in Dede Mason, a pretty stenographer. He makes large investments and gets into the political ring. For a rest he goes to the country. Daylight gets deeper into high finance in San Francisco, but often the longing for the simple life nearly overcomes him. Dede Mason buys a horse and Daylight meets her in her saddle trips. One day he asks Dede to go with him on one more ride, his purpose being to ask her to marry him and they canter away, she trying to analyze her feelings. Dede tells Daylight that her happiness could not lie with a money manipulator. Daylight undertakes to build up a great industrial community. He is insistent that she marry him and yet hopes to win her. Daylight falls back into his old drinking ways. There is a flurry in the money market, but Daylight tells Dede that he is going to work on a ranch and prove to her that he has reformed. Dede and Daylight are married at a little backwoods hotel. He has come back to wholesome, natural life, and they go to housekeeping in a spot close to nature.

CHAPTER XXI.

But there came the day, one year, in early April, when Dede sat in an easy chair on the porch, sewing on certain small garments, while Daylight read aloud to her. It was in the afternoon, and a bright sun was shining down on a world of new green. Along the irrigation channels of the vegetable garden streams of water were flowing, and now and again Daylight broke off from his reading to run out and change the flow of water. Also, he was teasingly interested in the certain small garments on which Dede worked, while she was radiantly happy over them, though at times, when his tender fun was too insistent, she was rosily confused or affectionately resentful. It was a few minutes later that Daylight, breaking off from his reading to change the streams of irrigation, found that the water had ceased flowing. He shouldered a pick and shovel, took a hammer and a pipe-wrench from the tool-house, and returned to Dede on the porch.

"I reckon I'll have to go down and dig the pipe out," he told her. "It's that slide that's threatened all winter. I guess she's come down at last."

"Don't you read ahead, now," he warned, as he passed around the house and took the trail that led down the wall of the canyon.

Halfway down the trail, he came upon the slide. It was a small affair, only a few tons of earth and crumbling rock; but, starting from fifty feet above, it had struck the water-pipe with force sufficient to break it at a connection. Before proceeding to work, he glanced up the path of the slide, and he saw what made his eyes startle and cease for the moment from questing farther.

"Hello," he communed aloud, "look who's here."

His glance moved on up the steep broken surface, and across it from side to side. Here and there, in places, small twisted manzanitas were rooted precariously, but in the main, save for weeds and grass, that portion of the canyon was bare. There were signs of a surface that had shifted often as the rain poured a flow of rich eroded soil from above over the lip of the canyon.

"A true fissure vein, or I never saw one," he proclaimed softly.

Dropping the hammer and pipe-wrench, but retaining pick and shovel, he climbed up the slide to where a vague line of out-jutting but mostly soil-covered rock could be seen. It was all but indiscernible, but his practiced eye had sketched the hidden information which it signified. Here and there, along this wall of the vein, he attacked the crumbling rock with the pick and shoveled the encumbering soil away. Several times he examined this rock. So soft was some of it that he could break it in his fingers. Shifting a dozen feet higher up, he again attacked with pick and shovel. And this time, when he rubbed the soil from a chunk of rock and looked, he straightened up suddenly, gasping with delight. And then, like a deer at a drinking pool in fear of its enemies, he flung a quick glance around to see if any eye were gazing upon him. He grinned at his own foolishness and returned to his examination of the chunk. A shaft of sunlight fell on it, and it was all aglitter with tiny specks of unmistakable free gold.

"From the grass roots down," he muttered in an awe-stricken voice, as he swung his pick into the yielding surface.

Sometimes he started small slides of earth that covered up his work and compelled him to dig again. Once he was swept fifty feet down the canyon-side; but he floundered and scrambled up again without pausing for breath. He hit upon quartz that was so rotten that it was almost like clay, and here the gold was richer than ever. It was a veritable treasure chamber. For a hundred feet up and down he traced the walls of the vein. He even climbed over the canyon-lip to look along the brow of the hill for signs of the outcrop. But that could wait, and he hurried back to his find.

He toiled on in the same mad haste, until exhaustion and an intolerable ache in his back compelled him to pause. He straightened up with even a richer piece of gold-laden quartz. Stooping, the sweat from his forehead had fallen to the ground. It now ran into his eyes, blinding him. He wiped it from him with the back of his hand and returned to a scrutiny of the gold. It would run thirty thousand to the ton, fifty thousand, anything—he knew that. And as he gazed upon the yellow lure, and panted for air, and wiped the sweat away, his quick vision leaped and set to work. He saw the spur-track that must run up from the valley and across the upland pastures, and he ran the grades and built the bridge that would span the canyon, until it was real before his eyes. Across the canyon was the place for the mill, and there he erected it; and he erected, also, the endless chain of buckets, suspended from a cable and operated by gravity, that would cross the canyon to the quartz-crusher. Likewise, the whole mine grew before him and beneath him—tunnels, shafts, and galleries, and hoisting plants. The blasts of the miners were in his ears, and from across the canyon he could hear the roar of the stamps. The hand that held the lump of quartz was trembling, and there was a tired, nervous palpitation apparently in the pit of his stomach. It came to him abruptly that what he wanted was a drink—whisky, cocktails, anything, a drink. And even then, with this new hot yearning for the alcohol upon him, he heard, faint and far, drifting down the green abyss of the canyon, Dede's voice, crying:—

"Here, chick, chick, chick, chick, chick! Here, chick, chick, chick!"

He was astounded at the lapse of time. She had left her sewing on the porch and was feeding the chickens preparatory to getting supper. The afternoon was gone. He could not conceive that he had been away that long.

It was the way she always called—first five, and then three. He had long since noticed it. And from these thoughts of her arose other thoughts that caused a great fear slowly to grow in his face. For it seemed to him that he had almost lost her. Not once had he thought of her in those frenzied hours, and for that much, at least, had she truly been lost to him. He dropped the piece of quartz, slid down the slide, and started up the trail, running heavily. At the edge of the clearing he eased down and almost crept to a point of vantage whence he could peer out, himself unseen. She was feeding the chickens, tossing to them handfuls of grain and laughing at their antics.

The sight of her seemed to relieve the panic fear into which he had been flung, and he turned and ran back down the trail. Again he climbed the slide, but this time he climbed higher, carrying the pick and shovel with him. And again he toiled frenziedly, but this time with a different purpose. He worked artfully, loosing slide after slide of the red soil and sending it streaming down and covering up all he had uncovered, hiding from the light of day the treasure he had discovered. He even went into the woods and scooped armfuls of last year's fallen leaves, which he scattered over the slide. But this he gave up as a vain task, and he sent more slides of soil down upon the scene of his labor, until no sign remained of the out-jutting walls of the vein. Next he repaired the broken pipe, gathered his tools together, and started up the trail. He walked slowly, feeling a great weariness, as of a man who had passed through a frightful crisis. He put the tools away, took a great drink of the water that again flowed through the pipes, and sat down on the bench by the open kitchen door. Dede was inside, preparing supper, and the sound of her footsteps gave him a vast content.

He breathed the balmy mountain air in great gulps, like a diver fresh-risen from the sea. And, as he drank in the air, he gazed with all his eyes at the clouds and sky and valley, as if he were drinking in that, too, along with the air.

"Here, Chick, Chick, Chick, Chick!"

Dede did not know he had come back, and at times he turned his head and stole glances in at her—at her efficient hands, at the bronze of her brown hair that smouldered with fire when she crossed the path of sunshine that streamed through the window, at the promise of her figure, that shot through him a pang most strangely sweet and sweetly dear. He heard her approaching the door, and kept his head turned resolutely toward the valley. And next, he thrilled, as he had always thrilled, when he felt the caressing gentleness of her fingers through his hair.

"I didn't know you were back," she said. "Was it serious?"

"Pretty bad, that slide," he answered, still gazing away and thrilling to her touch. "More serious than I reckoned. But I've got the plan. Do you know what I'm going to do?—I'm going to plant eucalyptus all over it. They'll hold it. I'll plant them thick as grass, so that even a hungry rabbit can't squeeze between them; and when they get their roots a-going, nothing in creation will ever move that dirt again."

"Why, is it as bad as that?"

He shook his head.

"Nothing exciting. But I'd sure like to see any blamed old slide get the best of me, that's all. I'm going to seal that slide down so that it'll stay there for a million years. And when the last trump sounds, and Sonoma Mountain and all the other mountains pass into nothingness, that old slide will be still a-standing there, held up by the roots."

He passed his arm around her and pulled her down on his knees.

"Say, little woman, you sure miss a lot by living here on the ranch—music, and theaters, and such things. Don't you ever have a hankering to drop it all and go back?"

So great was his anxiety that he dared not look at her, and when she laughed and shook her head he was aware of a great relief. Also, he noted the undiminished youth that rang through that same old-time boyish laugh of hers.

"Say," he said, with sudden fierceness, "don't you go fooling around that slide until after I get the trees in and rooted. It's mighty dangerous, and I sure can't afford to lose you now."

He drew her lips to his and kissed her hungrily and passionately.

"What a lover!" she said; and pride in him and in her own womanhood was in her voice.

"Look at that, Dede." He removed one encircling arm and swept it in a wide gesture over the valley and the mountains beyond. "The Valley of the Moon—a good name, a good name. Do you know, when I look out over it all, and think of you and of all it means, it kind of makes me ache in the throat, and I have things in my heart I can't find the words to say, and I have a feeling that I can almost understand Browning and those other high-flying poet-fellows. Look at Hood Mountain there, just where the sun's striking. It was down in that crease that we found the spring."

"And that was the night you didn't milk the cows till ten o'clock," she laughed. "And, if you keep me here much longer, supper won't be any earlier than it was that night."

Both rose from the bench, and Daylight caught up the milk-pail from the nail by the door. He paused a moment longer to look out over the valley.

"It's sure grand," he said.

"It's sure grand," she echoed, laughing joyously at him and with him and herself and all the world, as she passed in through the door.

And Daylight, like the old man he once had met, himself went down the hill through the fires of sunset with a milkpail on his arm.

THE END.

IS DEAN OF ALL INDIANS

Sitting Elk, Mighty Warrior Who Never Killed White Men, Is Oldest Redmen.

Oldest of all Indians in the United States, Sitting Elk, former chief of the Ogallella Sioux, is visiting in Denver, the guest of the white man, against whom he always refused to make war.

For almost a century he has been a leader among his people, but, wiser than other chiefs, he early realized that the red man was doomed and at every opportunity he counseled peace with the palefaces.

He could well afford to do so, for his people knew he was no coward.

"I have never killed a white man," he proudly boasts, "but I have fought many battles, and I have done many brave deeds in my long life of ninety-six years. I was but seventeen when I waylaid and killed my first enemy. That was a very brave deed. Since then I have killed many, many enemies."

Sitting Elk is a total abstainer. He smokes cigarettes, but insists he has none of the other bad habits of the white man. He is childless, the last of his line, but he expects to live for many years more—to be hale and hearty long after he has passed the century mark.

Sitting Elk moves tall and stately among his kinsmen, and puffs his pipe with a complacency unruffled by thoughts of any immediate journey to the happy hunting grounds.

Bright of eye, keen of mind, the old warrior dons paint and feathers for his appearance with the younger members of his tribe in the headlong dashes across the amphitheater at the stock yards, and rides with an abandon which defies the spectator to single him from the reckless redskins who have but one-fourth his years to their credit.

Perfect Peace.

IT IS CRIMINAL TO NEGLECT THE SKIN AND HAIR

Think of the suffering entailed by neglected skin troubles—mental because of disfiguration, physical because of pain. Think of the pleasure of a clear skin, soft, white hands, and good hair. These blessings, so essential to happiness and even success in life, are often only a matter of a little thoughtful care in the selection of effective remedial agents. Cuticura Soap and Ointment do so much for poor complexions, red, rough hands, and dry, thin and falling hair, and cost so little, that it is almost criminal not to use them. Although Cuticura Soap and Ointment are sold everywhere, a postal to "Cuticura," Dept. L, Boston, will secure a liberal sample of each, with 32-page booklet on skin and scalp treatment.

Minnesota Legislature

Proceedings at the Minnesota State Capitol for the Past Week.

St. Paul.—Governor A. O. Eberhart sent the following to the special session of the Minnesota legislature:

To the Senate and House of Representatives of the State of Minnesota:

You have been convened in extraordinary session at this time for the purpose of enacting into law three measures demanded by the people of this state, to-wit:

1. A statewide direct primary law for the nomination of all elective officials, national and state.
2. A stringent and effective corrupt practices act, applicable to both the nomination and election of all public officials.
3. A reapportionment of the legislative districts as required by and in accordance with the constitution of the state.

The last legislature failed to ratify the proposed amendment to the United States constitution providing for a federal income tax, and I herewith again transmit this proposed amendment for your consideration and recommend its ratification.

Since your adjournment congress has assigned ten members of the national house of representatives to the state of Minnesota, instead of nine, as at present. This necessitates the redistricting of the state into ten congressional districts, and there is no valid reason why this session should not provide for such congressional reapportionment.

A. O. EBERHART.

The house and senate assembled for an extra session of the Minnesota legislature, took different courses immediately. One of the first acts of the house was to name a program of six subjects in a new rule under which nothing else is to be considered except on a two-thirds vote of the whole house. The program is as follows:

Statewide primary law.
Corrupt practices act.
Reapportionment.
Ratification of income tax.
Ratification of amendment for direct election of United States senators.
Increase in gross earnings taxes.

Senator George Sullivan introduced joint resolutions providing for the ratification by the legislature of the constitutional amendments proposed by congress.

Two Election Bills Offered.

Senator W. W. Dunn of St. Paul introduced two election bills. The first provides for extension of the direct primary to state officers, but excluding judges, and permitting nominations to be filed by petition of fifty electors. The second provides for a presidential preference primary vote to be taken when delegates are elected to a convention for nominating presidential electors. It also provides for rotation of names in the general election ballot when two or more persons are to be elected to the same office.

Senator Frank Murray introduced the fifth and last bill of the day, a lengthy corrupt practices act.

He proposes to prohibit all hiring of conveyances to take voters to the polls and all watchers and workers at the polls. The bill limits expenditures of candidates to $7,500 for candidates for United States senate; $2,500 for congress; $5,000 for governor; $2,000 for other state officers; $400 for state senators; $150 for house members; $500 for presidential electors, and for all county, city and village officers, one-third of the first year's salary.

St. Paul, June 6.—Reapportionment won and lost in the second session of the senate and house of the Minnesota legislature in extra session. By a vote of 60 to 48 the house defeated a motion made by Joseph Davis of Watonwan county, that both legislative and congressional reapportionment be stricken from the house program.

In the senate 39 senators adopted the report of the rules committee, shutting out reapportionment by limiting the measures to be considered to the corrupt practices act and a state-wide primary law.

A reception committee was created to which all other bills offered will be referred. These bills, under the adopted rules, cannot be sent to the floor of the senate without the unanimous approval of the committee. A two-thirds vote of the senate will take preference, however.

Lieutenant Governor Gordon said that the reception committee to be appointed by him, would be made up of members favorable to an increase in the gross earnings tax. This is taken to indicate that the bars will again be lifted there. The only question on which the senators are expected to really stand pat is in their refusal to consider a reapportionment bill.

The first and second choice feature of the proposed state-wide primary law received the unanimous indorsement of the house committee on elections. The senate bill was presented the committee by Cleon T. Knapp and was referred to a sub-committee with instructions that the first and second choice feature be included in the measure when it was reported to the house.

Ernest Lundeen introduced a bill providing for the election of delegates to national party convention by direct vote.

Senator G. H. Sullivan introduced a primary election bill. A similar measure was introduced by the committee on elections.

St. Paul, June 7.—Breaking of the 39 "stand pat" senators only so far as to allow the passage of resolutions ratifying the congressional amendments to the constitution for a federal income tax and election of United States senators by a direct vote of the people, was predicted by members of the legislature.

It was declared that when the 55 senators signed a "gentlemen's agreement" not to consider any measures except the state-wide primary law and the corrupt practices act, there was a tacit understanding that this agreement did not affect the resolutions ratifying the two constitutional amendments and that these would be considered and passed when they reached the senate from the house.

A balk is feared, however, when the attempt is made to break the slate to allow the consideration of the house bill increasing the railroad gross earnings tax to 5 per cent. Senators have shown hostility to the bill in private conversations with friends. House members have expressed the fear that when the house bill reached the senate the rule that it must have the unanimous indorsement of the reception committee, would prevent its submission and that the bill could not rally a two-thirds vote necessary to recall it from the committee.

The resolutions ratifying the constitutional amendment will be referred to the reception committee. Under the new rules adopted by the senate, it will take a unanimous vote of this committee to secure a favorable report on the resolutions. If this fails the only action left for the friends of the resolutions is to recall them from the committee by a two-thirds vote of the senate. It is believed that this can be done.

The lieutenant governor said that he wanted to name a reception committee favorable to an increase in the gross earnings tax and also reapportionment. He seemed hopeful that both measures would be passed. He regards the resolution adopted in the senate providing for this committee as a sort of modification of the "gentlemen's agreement." This agreement stated that only a primary election bill and corrupt practices act would be considered and that the signatures of 32 members would make it binding. The resolution states that only the two measures would be considered on the floor and such other bills as the committee unanimously reported out.

The different primary election bills introduced in the senate were received from the printer and will be distributed among the senators.

The senate committee on mileage reported the number of miles each senator was entitled to be paid for in traveling to and from the session.

In the house the rules were suspended to allow the final passage of resolutions ratifying the constitutional amendments, providing for a federal income tax and the direct election of United States senators. Both were committee resolutions and they passed by a unanimous vote.

An invitation was received from the Minnesota Good Roads association to take a trip June 13 with the house members to the annual convention of the association in Interstate park, Taylor's Falls, to inspect the park and rock fields recently purchased for supplying crushed rock for good road purposes.

INCIDENTS BEFORE THE BIG REPUBLICAN CONTEST IN THE COLISEUM AT CHICAGO

Chicago, June 10.—The chief duty of the Chicago hotel clerk just now is to point out the political celebrities. It has been necessary to describe big men of the convention for persons seeking them so many times that John Burk, head clerk of the Annex, can give finest identifying details of attire and build of a statesman in a moment.

A great part of the population of the hotel consists of newspaper, magazine, and free lance photographers. Twelve snapshotters were in an arc about Senator J. M. Dixon of Montana, Colonel Roosevelt's manager, when he consented to be photographed on his arrival.

Before the senator reached the hotel on Wednesday two men had been led out on Michigan avenue by the camera squad in the belief that each of the accommodating strangers was the Montanan. One photographer would be "tipped off" that "the tall, white haired man in the Panama is Senator Dixon."

The stranger at once would be invited out in the street for different poses in the sun. Of the two cases of mistaken identity one was A. B. Butler of Washington, a Taft camp aid. It is said the other was a Boston linen salesman. He did not deny he was Senator Dixon, and posed graciously with and without his hat and facing in different advantageous angles.

A New One From Texas.

Col. Cecil Lyon of the Texas delegation, and an irrepressible supporter of Roosevelt, had a new story to tell to take the place of his old one about the cataclysm in Yoakum county, Texas, where a Democratic county convention instructed for Roosevelt, causing Wilson supporters to bolt.

"I was walking down the street with Charles Hilles in Washington the other day," began Colonel Lyon, after some one had said President Taft's secretary had arrived at the Blackstone hotel.

"A small delivery wagon passed," the colonel continued. "I looked up and saw four large volumes stacked on top with the titles facing us. Three of the books were reports of the Republican conventions of 1900, 1904 and 1908. The fourth was 'Problems of the Day,' by William H. Taft. I directed Mr. Hilles' attention to the load of books. He seemed offended."

Borah's Bushy Hair.

Senator Borah of Idaho is one of the few big men of the convention who cannot be called picturesque, unless his bushy hair entitles him to that description. It is said his only reason for wearing so much hair is to conceal a bad scar on the back of his head received in an accident in his youth.

Mr. Borah, like Jonah K. Kalanianaole, Hawaiian delegate, has a round, chubby, Buster Brown type of physiognomy. His dignity, however, is such that none would think of calling him "Cupid"—and that is the brown skinned islander's nickname in congress.

Has His Name on $5 Bill.

A southern delegate was much excited over the appearance of a tall negro at the Coliseum annex who figured in several conferences.

"Have you a $5 bill?" asked a friend.

When the currency was produced the friend called attention to the signature of the registrar of the treasury, Judson Lyon.

"That same dark person over there is Judson Lyon, delegate from Georgia," was the explanation.

Urey Woodson's Story.

Urey Woodson, secretary of the Democratic national committee, is telling a story which has what he claims is a moral.

"You Republicans," says Mr. Woodson, "remind me of old Colonel Gunfire, who, although a Democrat, lived in a stronghold of Republicanism. One winter he blew in and asked to be sworn in as a member of the Democratic legislature.

"Colonel, did you sure enough beat a Republican?"

"Suh, I beat three of 'em at once."

"Now that is what we are going to do in less numbers. Get together and scrap, but after it is over watch us Democrats beat two of you, Taft and Teddy, all at once."

Want Sherman Renominated.

Former Governor Franklin Murphy of New Jersey took his seat with the national committee minus the vice-presidential boom which he had with him four years ago. This year Mr. Murphy is singing the praises of Vice-President Sherman for another term.

"I know that custom is against renominating a vice-president," he said, "but there is a strong current in favor of renominating Vice-President Sherman. It will probably be an eastern man and all the gossip I have heard has been for Sherman."

Mr. Murphy added that the "vice-presidential bee" has ceased to buzz in his direction.

A group of out-of-town newspaper representatives were on the point of making an [illegible] in the vicinity of the Coliseum of emergency cafes for reference in times of busy sessions.

Good Nature the Rule.

Good nature is the rule among all of the national committeemen and delegates. None is too harassed by puzzling political entanglements to deny any one a smile and handshake.

"An old crab has lots of luck in this game—I don't think!" laughed Senator Dixon, Roosevelt's manager, after he had passed out a dozen pulsating hand grasps. Then he walked over to former Senator Dick—Taft contest director—in the lobby of national committee headquarters at the Coliseum annex and slapped him on the back.

"'Lo," said Mr. Dixon.

"Right back at you, senator," smiled Mr. Dick.

Those who were near the two chiefs of the hostile camps could hear a boyish "Joe" and "Charley" being exchanged at times. They were like old college chums. Friendly eye twinkling scenes between chiefs and lieutenants and subalterns of the opposing forces were common.

One noteworthy meeting that started amicably and ended in a torrid argument was between Joseph Kealing of Indiana and Congressman Lucius C. Littauer of New York.

Importance of the Bell Boys.

The bell boys of the big hotels have been pressed into service for all sorts of duties. They not only carry ice water and life preservers to the various headquarters and rooms of delegates, but also serve in the capacity of page, "state house messenger," marshal of delegations, office boy, introducer, and general headquarters attache.

There are hundreds of different documents to be exchanged between headquarters, with verbal explanations to go to the men in charge.

"Here's the list of delegates from Alabama with the Twenty-third district left out," a delegation chief explains to the boy in buttons. "Take it up to Senator Blank with my compliments, and inform him I will send the rest to him in half an hour."

When a hop was dispatched with a copy of the recommendations of the rules committee, to be submitted to the national committee, a senator remarked:

"That young man has a mission of more widespread influence than that of any other boy in America."

"Whoo-ee," sighed a bell boy. He was counting change. "Nine hours on the hop and only $1.60 in tips. I am going to vote the Democratic ticket straight."

Teddy's Bulldog.

When the Roosevelt press bureau arrived from Washington they brought with them a new campaign song, which is causing a smile even among the Taft delegations. It is to the tune of "Casey Jones."

Teddy's gotta dawg, but he aint no hound,
He's a square jawed bull, and his face is round,
His legs is short, and he's close to the ground,
And you bet they ain't kickin' Teddy's dawg around.

CHORUS.

Square jawed bull, and his face is round,
Squared jawed bull, and his face is round,
Short-legged bull, close to the ground,
And you bet they ain't kickin' Teddy's bull around.

The Democratic dawg, the unlucky hound,
That the boys have all been kickin' around
Is the same old dawg that's been stickin' roun'
Since old Abe Lincoln came to Washington town.

And now he comes back, the measley hound,
With his face and his tail still hangin' down,
The hungry, sly old lop eared hound,
No wonder the boys have been kickin' round.

All Taft Types.

It has been noticed that a great part of the delegates that have arrived are robust men. "All Taft types," commented an admirer of the president. Chief among the heavyweights is A. M. Stevenson, Colorado national committeeman, who hails from Denver. Mr. Stevenson weighs more than 300 pounds.

Delegation From Hawaii.

Seated in a corner of the Pompeian room at the Congress hotel was a little party composed of the Hawaiian delegation. Prince Kalanianaole, generally called "Prince Cupid," and C. A. Rice, delegates from the island; H. L. Holstein, national committeeman; A. Horner, secretary to the delegation, and Colonel S. Parker, the "Mark Hanna of Hawaii," made up the party.

"It can't be all work and no play," said the prince.

Since a Roosevelt delegation came into the Congress singing a parody on the "Houn' Dog," Taft supporters have begun to put themselves in practice for the campaign yells.

Short, long, loud and sharp, they come in all varieties. Some are for [illegible] and some after the nomination. A [illegible] is being written [illegible]

FINAL RESULT OF IMPURE BLOOD

The System Is Left Weak, Run Down and Helpless Against the Attacks of Disease.

If you need strength, if your blood is thin, your digestion disordered, it will pay you to investigate the merits of Dr. Williams' Pink Pills, the remedy that has transformed so many weak, anaemic, dyspeptic, ambitionless people into strong, healthy, hungry men and women.

Mrs. Lena May Roberts, whose address is R. F. D. No. 3, Aberdeen, So. Dakota, after several months of suffering finally found the right tonic in Dr. Williams' Pink Pills. She says:

"For months after the birth of my baby, I suffered terribly from a general breakdown in health. I was in bed for three months and after that was able to be up only part of the time. I was sick all over, being pale, weak and thin. My appetite was gone and my head ached most of the time. Oftentimes there seemed to be a rush of blood to my head and I would faint away. I was very nervous and was not strong enough to do any work.

"As the treatment I was taking did not help me, I began to take Dr. Williams' Pink Pills, which a friend said had helped her. After taking a few boxes, I began to get well rapidly. I continued using them for a time and am now as well and strong as ever in my life."

The value of Dr. Williams' Pink Pills in general debility lies in their direct response to the needs of the blood. Their work is to make new blood. That they do this well is shown by the gradual disappearance of the symptoms and the return of color and health. They lay the foundation for permanent health in the future.

For the same reason these pills have cured anaemia, after-effects of the grip and fevers, rheumatism, indigestion, and nervousness, dizziness, neuralgia and St. Vitus' dance, and are recommended wherever a tonic for the blood and nerves is needed.

A valuable booklet, "Diseases of the Blood," containing fuller information about rheumatism and other diseases of the blood will be sent free upon request.

A PIRATE AMONG PIRATES

by CAPTAIN GEORGE B. BOYNTON

COPYRIGHT BY THE RIDGWAY CO.

Editor's Note—Capt. George B. Boynton died a few months ago in Brooklyn. He served, all told, under eighteen flags and his life has furnished much material for fiction. This is a story of some of his adventures told by himself for the first time.

IT was in the summer of 1874 that I made my first plunge into piracy, for, with all of the trimmings and aids to deception stripped away, that was what it really amounted to. I did not know into just what I was being led when I embarked in this new enterprise, but I am frank to say that it would have made no difference, for a free translation of the word "piracy" is "adventure of the first order," and that was what I was looking for.

Frank Norton, who had interested me in the China sea, said we would need the Leckwith and two ships to carry on the business to the best advantage, so I selected the Surprise, an American brig, and the Florence, a topsail schooner, both stout, fast ships. I put Lorensen on the Leckwith as sailing-master, George Brown on the Surprise, and old Bill Heather on the Florence. The Surprise took on a general cargo for Japan and was ordered to rendezvous at Hong Kong, while the Florence loaded for Singapore. Norton and I followed in the Leckwith.

We reached Singapore more than a month ahead of the Florence. Our scheme was to prey on the pirates who infested the China sea, and particularly that part of it lying between Singapore, Sumatra and Borneo, which was dotted with islands and beautifully suited by nature to their plundering profession, and many were the good ships that ended their cruises there, along with their passengers and crews. The British government had been trying for years to put an end to their operations, but the undertaking was a gigantic one. It was not until years after that it was officially announced that piracy had been suppressed, and piracy is still being carried on, even to this day, though in a small and desultory way.

The chief of a large section of the Chinese pirates was old Moy Sen, a rich Chinaman who lived in a handsome home in Canton and posed as a peaceful trader.

Norton argued that the pirates were bound to keep on robbing and burning and murdering in spite of anything we could do, and that we could derive plenty of excitement and large profits by robbing them. Incidentally, he contended we would put a lot of them out of business for good and all, thus contributing to the end desired by all nations.

It was arranged that I should pose as Dr. Burnet, a rich English physician who was cruising in his private yacht for his health. The Florence and Surprise were to carry some general cargoes from port to port among the islands, but were so to shape their cruises that we could keep closely in touch with them. They were to be given large crews and so heavily armed as to be safe from piratical attacks. The Leckwith was to do all of the preying on the pirates, and the loot we took from them was to be turned over to the other ships at the meeting-places. It was arranged that the bulk of our loot should be sent to a firm of Chinamen at Singapore, who dealt largely in dishonest cargoes.

With the Leckwith's bunkers stuffed with coal, we headed for the islands in search of pirates.

Our first experience was a profitable one. When near the "hunting grounds" we lowered the smokestack, got up our canvas and sailed along, awaiting developments. We were getting in among the islands when we met a big junk which had just looted and scuttled a richly laden Brazilian barkentine. We made a pretense of trying to get away, but in reality we eased our sheets to hasten matters along. When she was close astern of us, with the wind abeam, we luffed up, got out guns ready for action in a jiffy and, as we crossed her bows, raked her fore and aft with our carronades, which were loaded almost to the muzzle with slugs and nails.

Taken completely by surprise and with more than half of their number littering the reddened deck, the pirates were panic-stricken. Before they could regain their senses we came about again and gave them another broadside, which put them at our mercy. As we ranged alongside, keeping up a rifle-fire, but disdaining any further use of our guns, they managed to launch a couple of boats, and all who could get into them pulled for the nearest island. We took out of the junk fully one hundred thousand dollars' worth of specie, silk, tea, porcelain and drugs, and then set fire to her, leaving her to bury her own dead.

After that easily won victory we trapped and and sank half a dozen proas and faluccas in the same way, though with more spirited resistance in some cases.

We had turned our cargo over to the Florence, along with a number of wounded men, and were back among the islands, when early one evening a full-rigged ship hove in sight. She passed us, but was not more than six miles away when we saw flashes that told us she had been attacked, and we lost no time in going to her assistance.

As we closed in we saw a Malay felucca on each side of her and the pirates swarming on her decks, with the crew putting up a brave fight. Running the Leckwith up on her starboard quarter, we threw our men aboard and they went at the pirates savagely from the rear. I led the boarding party.

The Malays outnumbered us more than two to one, but we went at them with a fury that was new to them and were slowly forcing them back toward their one good boat—we had smashed the other one to bits when we slammed alongside—when a beautiful white yacht came tearing up on the port quarter and sent three boatloads of men to our assistance in smart style. They clambered over the bows under command of a stockily built young officer wearing what looked like the uniform of a naval captain, and we had the pirates between us.

I under[illegible], when I learned who and what th[illegible] these re-enforcements, instead [illegible] the Malays caused them [illegible] renewed desperation, but they could not withstand our combined rush, and the last them soon went over the side into their proa, which drifted away into the darkness when they cut her loose. However, in the last few minutes of fighting, the young British officer, as I took him to be, sustained a savage cut in his right shoulder, and after we had laid aside our dead and given our wounded rough attention I was surprised to receive an inquiry from him as to whether we had a surgeon on board. Taking him aboard the Leckwith, I dressed his wound on the cabin table. I then saw that his uniform was that of a captain, but not of a naval officer. He told me his name was Deverell, but when I asked him the name of his ship he answered evasively, and I had learned the ways of the China sea too well to press the question.

At Singapore, where we discharged our cargo, our agents reported that Moy Sen was vowing vengeance on us for the loot we had wrested from him and the havoc we had spread among his fleet. We worked our way back to the rendezvous and, after consulting with Norton, I took my interpreter, Ah Fen, who was half "Chinkie" and half Malay, from the Leckwith and went to Hong Kong on the Surprise to see just what was going on.

"The Beautiful White Devil," a woman pirate, whom I at first regarded as a purely fanciful being, came into my life on this visit to Hong Kong in the early day of 1876.

While waiting for Ah Fen's report I lounged around the hotel. Soon I began to hear weird stories of a woman pirate who, while never molesting honest merchantmen, preyed mercilessly and successfully on the Chinese and Malay pirates, just as Norton and I were doing.

It occurred to me at once that if such a woman really did exist it might have been her ship whose captain I had attended, but I could not make myself believe the tales that were told me.

Then a man called at my hotel one evening and asked if an English physician was stopping there, and I recognized Captain Deverell, but he was as formal as a stranger, and I did not indicate that I knew him. He asked if he could consult with me and I took him to my room, where he assumed a much more cordial air.

"I called," he said, "to invite you take a cruise with me so that we may get better acquainted and I can show you my appreciation of your kindness."

I packed my bag and turned it over to a man whom Deverell summoned from the street.

I was given the cabin of the surgeon, who had died recently. Deverell took me to his room and we talked until midnight.

It was considerably after eight bells before I retired, but my sleep was not long or heavy. At breakfast time Deverell, wearing a smart uniform, escorted me aft to the private quarters of the queen.

In a moment the queen appeared. As she parted the curtains and paused in the doorway with an air of diffidence, I was transfixed by her marvelous beauty.

"I already know Dr. Burnet," she said, as she swept toward me with superb grace and infinite charm of manner and extended her hand, small and soft.

"We are headed for my retreat," she explained. "I should like to have you stay with us as long as you can. I will put you down in Hong Kong or Singapore on three or four days' notive."

I assured her the prospect was delightful.

On the afternoon of the third day out from Hong Kong we ran into a group of islands, off to the eastward of the regular course to Singapore. Just as dinner was announced a flag was waved from the bridge and I made out an answering signal on the steep side of a small island just ahead of us, but could see no sign of either a landing or an opening. Then a messenger brought word that the queen was waiting dinner for me. The ship slowed down while we were at dinner and finally the screw stopped. Immediately the queen led the way to the deck.

"This," she said, "is my kingdom—without a king. Isn't it beautiful?"

I assured her that it was the most beautiful place I had ever seen, wherein, when day dawned, I found I had not exaggerated. We were at the head of an oval lake, perhaps a mile and a half long, with mountains rising crescent-shaped around it. There was a small village of English cottages and native huts. On three sides of the lake was a narrow beach; the fourth side, toward the sea, was a perpendicular bluff, sixty feet or more high. I searched it for the passage through which we had entered the lake, but nothing could I see but a bare wall of dark rock. The queen smiled at my perplexity. "Wait until tomorrow," she laughed. "We will go ashore at sunrise."

She appeared with the sun, accompanied by a Dyak woman whom I had not seen before, and we landed at a little stone dock in front of the village. All of the inhabitants, consisting of about fifty English and Scotch men and women, some with silvered locks and bent backs, and some of them [illegible] by the pirates [illegible] village, which was a model of neatness, and on up a winding path for nearly a mile, when a sharp turn around a flank of the mountain brought us to a large bungalow—the palace of the queen.

While breakfast was being prepared she made herself more beautiful by changing her dress of European style for a native costume of flowing silk so becoming that I wondered at her ever wearing anything else. After breakfast she looked down at the little town and far out to sea in silence for a long time and then told me the story of her life.

Her name, she said, was Katherine Crofton; her father one of the younger branches of a family headed by a baron. Her father was a lieutenant-commander in the British navy, and to prevent an accident he disobeyed the order of an incompetent and arrogant superior officer. In a quarrel that followed, her father knocked his superior down and otherwise abused him, for which he was court-martialed and dismissed.

"My father was a high-spirited man," she continued, "and his disgrace embittered him against England and everything English. He soon left home, and when we next heard from him he was in Hong Kong. When I was about fifteen, he wrote mother and me to take a P. & O. ship for Singapore, where we would find further instructions. When we got there father was waiting for us on a handsome yacht, the Queen. I am still using her. He brought us to to this island, where he had established a small settlement and built a warehouse and a machine shop for repairs. He had taken great pains to make his rendezvous secure from discovery.

"When I was not much older than nineteen father and mother were taken desperately ill, and he called me into his room and made a confession. He said that in his hatred of the British he had turned pirate and had been for all those years preying on ships flying the flag he despised. He had also, occasionally, waged war on the native pirates and taken their loot from them, which explained why he had frequently come in with wounded men on board, and he made me swear that if he died I would continue the work he had begun. He told me I could rely on Frank Deverall, his chief officer, whom he said he hoped I would some day marry,"—this last with just a trace of sarcasm. "My father died the next week and my mother three months later.

"That was four years ago. I have kept the oath, but the fulfillment has brought me increasing misery. My attacks on the British flag have been few—in fact, I have given timely assistance to many more English ships than I have robbed, and hundreds of their passengers and crews owe their lives to me, but I have preyed on the natural pirates of these waters as ardently, perhaps, as did my father."

After luncheon the queen and I set off toward the mountain-top, nearly one thousand feet above us, but we did not reach it, for the heat was intense.

"Well, what do you think of us now?" she asked, on our way down, after I had told her how I had spent the forenoon.

"I think enough of you to devote my whole life to your service!" I quickly replied.

When I came back to dinner she was waiting for me in her bower. As she came to meet me and extended her hand she said, earnestly and almost sadly: "I believe you were honest and sincere in what you said this afternoon, but I can only say 'Thank you.' What you suggested is impossible."

In the three weeks that followed I urged my love upon her with all of my determination, but she refused to change her decision and apparently was as firm in it as she was at first. It was agreed that we should both give up piracy, but all of our arguments ended there until finally, one afternoon, as we sat looking out over the sea and talking of the ordinary affairs of life, she said, slowly and emphatically, "Deverell was my father's right-hand man. I am going to take the next ship for England, lay my case before the home secretary and ask him for a full pardon. I will confess to him that I have taken from the pirates what they had stolen from others. To offset that [illegible] hundreds of written statements from people whose lives I have saved from the pirates. [illegible]"

I knew about where to find the Florence. We picked her up in a few days and I boarded her made sail to meet the Leckwith at the rendezvous. Kate went on to Singapore, where she took the next ship for England. Six months later I received word that she had died suddenly there, before she had applied for a pardon, and the course of my life was changed.

When I rejoined the Leckwith, I told Norton simply that I had been away on strictly private business. A day or two later I told him I had decided to sell the Florence and Surprise and quit the business we were in. Norton, dumfounded, advanced many arguments against such a course, and finally he lost his temper. "It may be," he suggested sneeringly, "that this is due to the fact that Moy Sen has threatened to exterminate us. If you don't want to fight the old scoundrel why don't you say so?"

That dart struck a tender spot. I would be the last one to quite under a threat or under fire, and Norton knew it. "Far from running away from a fight of that kind," I told Norton, "I should much rather run into it. We will cruise around awhile to see whether the Chinkies really mean to give us battle. But it is the sport of it that I want and nothing else, for if it comes off it will be a great fight."

Nothing happened for ten days or two weeks. We saw several junks which we could easily have stood up and robbed, but I would not permit it. Then, late one evening an enormous junk appeared suddenly from behind an island. She appeared to carry only a small crew, but when we came together it seemed to me for a moment that she had more Chinamen on board than I had ever seen before at one time. Suddenly she swung to starboard and would have smashed into our bow if we had not gone full speed astern. As she passed under our bowsprit she threw a grappling-iron which caught on our port bow.

We lit our battle-lamps so that they illuminated our deck, where we preferred to fight because we knew every foot of it.

It was such a fight as one gets into only in years, perhaps only once in a lifetime. The butchery was dreadful, but the excitement of it set one's blood ablaze. There was not a pirate left alive on the junk or on our own deck.

Before we had time to congratulate ourselves or count noses, we discovered a big steamer almost on top of us. It was the Ly-ce-moon, the flagship of Moy Sen's fleet, and, though we did not know it, the old pirate chief himself was in command of her.

The result was a repetition of what had occurred with the crew of the junk, but it required much longer to accomplish it.

Gradually, but slowly at first, we got the upper hand of them.

It was broad daylight by the time we had thrown overboard the last of the dead Chinamen and washed down the decks, after giving our own badly wounded men such attention as was possible under the conditions. We thought for a time that Moy Sen had escaped, but we found him, almost chopped to pieces, close to the after-wheelhouse, with three of our men beside him.

On the Ly-ce-moon were two teak chests, filled with gold and silver coin and ingots, silverware, jewelry and precious and semi-precious stones of the Oriental variety, apparently representing the most valuable portions of several stolen cargoes, and these I allowed to be transferred to the Leckwith, in preference to throwing them overboard.

It then became a question as to what we should do with Moy Sen's ships. We compromised the difficulty by scuttling the junk and putting a crew aboard the steamer. We went to Singapore, arriving there in the early part of 1876, as I remember it, to close up our business, and sold the pirate ship to our Chinese agents for a third of what she was worth. We also sold to them, for a small part of its value, the loot we had taken from her, but all of that money was divided up between Norton and the crew. I held to my promise and touched none of it.

I left the China sea behind me and never have returned to it.

After a fruitless expedition after buried treasure in Corea, we sailed for Shanghai and from there for London.

VISITS NOTED CITY

Rouen, France.—Flora, Dear: It seems almost cruel to write of Rouen, when you were denied the pleasure of visiting here. You were ever a stanch admirer of Jeanne d'Arc, and we planned to cover the scenes of her triumphs and misfortunes, since our first history days.

The mediaeval city has quite measured up to my expectations. Jack and I explored the glorious old Gothic cathedral from the crypt to the belfry tower. What a wonderful specimen of architecture it is! We made several fairly good sketches of the nave as well as the exterior.

In the Place de la Pucelle stands a statue of the Maid of Orleans, over the exact spot where she was burned.

The surrounding country is extremely alluring, and each day we tramp for miles. The well-kept fields of grain or vegetables each has its border of field-flowers blooming in riotous profusion. Poppies, daisies, buttercups, and bluets grow, apparently, to garland some child's hat.

One afternoon, feeling rather tired and hungry, after walking six miles, we stopped at a farm cottage and procured milk and fresh bread. The good wife, a typical belle of Normandy, was most kind to us. She spread our feast in the vine-clad summer house of her lovely garden.

In the distance we could plainly distinguish the tower where Jeanne d'Arc was imprisoned for so many weary months. Jack pityingly narrated a few instances concerning her imprisonment which history fails to relate. In the midst of his conversation, our hostess disappeared. She returned, however, almost immediately, holding in her hand a small box of antique copper. Giving this to Jack, she requested him to examine its contents.

Upon opening the box he drew forth a rosary, much discolored from age, the beads being evidently of ivory. After murmuring a short prayer, she gave us the history of the rosary. One of her ancestors was the keeper of Jeanne d'Arc during the period of imprisonment at Rouen. He was devoted to this unfortunate maid, and did everything in his power to relieve her suffering. He supplied her with appetizing food and at the risk of his life delivered messages to her friends. During the long siege of her trial he faithfully served her in every manner, and when the Inquisition finally condemned her to death at the stake he was heart-broken. The bishop of Beauvais ordered her Bible and rosary to be destroyed, denying her the consolation of religion, so far as his power extended. Crushed and humiliated, she awaited her terrifying fate. The keeper, at her request, procured a rosary from a sympathetic priest, who was powerless to aid the maid. She was quite overcome by the keeper's devotion, and blessed him many times.

Finally, the day set for the awful event arrived and the innocent victim of superstition was led forth from her prison tower to pay the price of her service to Charles VII. of France. When the light had been applied to the fagots and the flames rose about the frail form of Jeanne d'Arc, the unrelenting bishop discovered the rosary suspended at her side. He ordered a priest to remove it, but as he drew near the saintly Jeanne the flames formed a forbidding barrier, which no one could brave.

The rosary is the cherished treasure of the little woman, who is the only surviving member of her family. She claims that the rosary possesses the power of consolation, however great the sorrow may be.

Dear Jean, you should know her! She is the personification of peace and repose.

We leave for Paris in a week. Do arrange to join us there!

Ever lovingly,

JEAN DOUGLAS.

Chance to Carry on Fishing Rod Farm

NOTHIN' LIKE HAVIN' PLENTY O' FISHIN' RODS — !!!

WASHINGTON. — Raising bamboo for the market is a new industry that the department of agriculture has succeeded in launching. The report of the flourishing condition of the bamboo plantation has come from Florida to David Fairchild, chief of the bureau of foreign plant introduction. The establishment of the crop is the result of more than four years' hard work. The department also has found a way of shipping the bamboo so that the young plants will grow, and this has been the hardest part of the problem.

Raising bamboo commercially has been a flourishing industry in Japan for years. It was felt for a long time that it was a business that ought to do well here, because it furnishes a quick growing timber that is susceptible of a number of special uses. There is as much difference between the ornamental bamboo commonly grown here and the timber bamboo as there is between a dray horse and a polo pony. It has never been accurately determined just what the structural strength of bamboo is, though the strength is immense for its weight. Some tests are to be made of the new government crop at the bureau of standards. The wood is already much used in the manufacture of aeroplanes, and when it is known just what can be expected of it there will be even a greater demand for it.

It is used very largely in Japan for house building, though it is not expected it will be in much demand as a building timber in this country, except in restricted localities.

One of the important uses of the wood that has been found abroad is for cheap, subsurface irrigation pipes.

Sent His Glass Eye to the Laundry

A LITTLE white light on the telephone switchboard in a local hotel the other day gleamed brightly for a moment. Then it began to wink rapidly, as if the person at the other end of the wire was jangling the telephone hook in great perturbation.

"Operator," called the young woman at the board.

"Send me up a bellboy. Quick! Hurry! I've lost something!" exclaimed an agitated voice.

A bellboy was dispatched posthaste and found D. A. Malcolm of Butte, Mont., greatly excited.

"I left a valuable article wrapped in a white handkerchief on my table," he exclaimed, "and it must have been taken away in the laundry. It is very valuable. Find it for me. Here's a dollar. Hurry up!"

The bellboy, with inward mutterings at the carelessness of guests who leave diamond necklaces or gold cufflinks wrapped up in handkerchiefs, hastened to the package room.

"Did you see a little bundle wrapped up in a handkerchief?" he gasped to the head porter.

"Saw a handkerchief all wadded up. It's just gone to the marking room. What's the matter? What was in it?" But the boy had fled.

Following the lad to the marking room, the porter was just in time to hear:

"Yes, I sent it into the sorting room," and to see the bellhop, now thoroughly aroused with the spirit of the chase, disappear into the sorting room.

He hastened thither and, seeing the boy frantically pawing over the soiled linen, watched him until the youth triumphantly pulled forth the object of the search.

"Give us a look," cried the porter. "What was you so crazy about?"

Without replying the breathless bellhop gingerly pulled the handkerchief open and disclosed Mr. Malcom's perfectly good blue glass eye.

Unique Experiences in Filibustering

PAID ME TO HAVE A LITTLE NERVE

A VETERAN Washington correspondent of a metropolitan newspaper was telling some of his experiences in the national capital to a group of friends the other night.

"Whenever the organizers of a filibuster force have an all-night session it is a picnic for the denizens of the national capital, who flock to the big temple of legislation in the hope of seeing and hearing sensational episodes.

"In the days when Tom Reed of Maine was speaker filibusters by the Democratic minority were far more frequent than now and were marked with greater bitterness. During one of these seances a gigantic representative from Texas, Buck Kilgore by name, growing hungry and thirsty, too, no doubt, concluded that he would be better off at home and, forgetting the locked doors, started to execute that idea. It chanced that he sat near the only partition that separated the speaker's lobby, and that was a flimsy door of green baize, and though the faithful minion of the house had locked it, the Texan, with one mighty kick of his right foot, encased in a No. 12 cowhide boot, burst the slight affair as easily as though it had been of paper and out he marched to the steps that led to freedom.

"The incident was duly chronicled and Kilgore awoke to find himself temporarily famous. The sublime nerve he manifested set the whole country to laughing. The thing turned out very happily to the kicker in a way that he had never imagined. From every part of the Union enterprising manufacturers sent him boots of the most expensive kind, accompanied by polite notes begging to be allowed the privilege of naming a brand of footgear after him.

Two Races Compared in Mathematics

THE relative mathematical abilities of boys and girls and of the white race as compared with the black are among the subjects taken up by the United States bureau of education.

"It seems to be the general opinion that the average boy shows more ability in mathematics than the average girl, but also that he does not work so faithfully," said the bureau. "In a mixed class this greater ability of the boy and the greater faithfulness of the girl react most advantageously on each other.

"Another fact that is noted is this: In elementary algebra the girl does as good work as the boy; in geometry not nearly so good. In advanced algebra and trigonometry, the boy shows an ability which is far ahead of the girl. Yet, we are free to confess that his greater natural ability is often outclassed by the steady, patient endeavor of the girl.

"In regard to the relative tendency of boys and girls to choose elective courses in mathematics answers to inquiries indicate that boys are much more inclined to elect such courses than girls are."

In investigating the relative mathematical ability of the negro race, an examiner was sent to eleven well-known negro schools and colleges in the south.

"Five of the schools feel that there is no difference due to race. Two are of the opinion that negro students generally are not the equals of white students. One school was not able to make any comparison. Three did not reply to the question regarding a comparison of the races. Replies were made by both white and negro teachers who have had years of experience in negro schools and in some cases in [illegible] schools.

PROMINENT PEOPLE

U. S. STUDENTS FRIVOLOUS?

If his complexion were a shade lighter, a short heavy, spectacled man who has been nearly a month in this country studying conditions and lecturing at universities, could easily pose as Rudyard Kipling, the great English author. He is Dr. Inazo Nitobe, Tokyo, Japan. So much does Dr. Nitobe resemble Rudyard Kipling, at one view of his countenance, that it is really startling. But it is a one view effect only. When he turns again he looks only like the typical Japanese that he is.

His mind is filled with impressions that are registered by two sharp brown eyes that look through heavy spectacles. Dr. Nitobe, who has been studying the country, and its people, and incidentally has been giving some thought to the student while lecturing at universities, is the first representative of the pedagogues who are to come to this country under the arrangement provided by means of the Carnegie fund. Dr. Nitobe is president of First Higher college of Tokyo.

He says that he does not find the boy students in the United States occupying the high moral plane that he had expected. Also that he observed that the men are far less serious in the work than the Japanese students.

TO FOUND NEW CITY OF ZION

Mrs. Jane Dowie, widow of the late John Alexander Dowie, first apostle of Zion, is attempting a reconstruction of the Zionist movement in Chicago.

Believing herself divinely inspired to carry out the work her husband began, Mrs. Dowie came to Chicago last fall and gathered about her the few remaining members of the prophet's original flock. An exile from Zion City and the tabernacles her husband founded, she planned to rebuild the Zion congregation with the aid of Gladstone Dowie, "unkissed" son of the departed Elijah II.

The younger Dowie was in full sympathy with the plans of his mother, but apparently lacked the divine inspiration for the task she has undertaken. He had already resigned from the present church at Zion City following the assumption of absolute control of Wilbur Glenn Voliva, general overseer and successor apparent to the first apostle and is now studying for the Episcopal ministry.

Mrs. Dowie has not allowed the defection of her son to dismay her, but has regained spiritual communion with nearly 1,000 of the original congregation. The reunion of the present flock, she declares, does not mean a schism from the religious teachings of the parent church.

VICTORIA WINNER IN SPAIN

Queen Victoria of Spain is slowly but surely winning the affection of the Spanish people, who at first strongly disapproved of her and her English ways. In fact, if King Alfonso succeeds in keeping his throne it will be due in part to the domestic virtues of his wife. Queen Victoria has set a new fashion in Spanish society, that of mothers taking personal interest in their children.

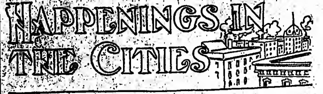
Queen Victoria practically devotes her life to her babies. She oversees the work of the nurses and occasionally may be seen on the grounds of the palace wheeling the Princess Beatrice in her specially imported English perambulator just like any English mother. All this is in defiance of the rigorous court etiquette of Spain, which demands that a queen should leave the care of her children entirely to others.

When the prince of the Asturias was born, according to historical custom, a peasant woman from Catalonia was engaged to act as nurse to the heir to the throne. She was a very handsome Catalonian and wore the elaborate and picturesque national costume, but Queen Victoria soon discovered that she was entirely ignorant of hygiene and was discharged.

AMERICAN WIDOW WINS NOBLE

A white and gold gown, with a collar and tiara of diamonds and sapphires, won for the beautiful Mrs. Wylie Reynolds of Jackson, Mich., an Italian nobleman with the blood of Bourbon kings in his veins, and Paris dressmakers and modistes are busy upon one of the most elaborate trousseaus which has left the city since Princess Maria Bonaparte married Prince George of Greece, in 1907.

Mrs. Reynolds is the widow of a millionaire banker. The Italian nobleman whom she has won is Baron di Francisci, son of Marchese di Triana. His family is connected with the Bourbons of Parma and the Bourbons of the Two Sicilies, who are themselves branches of the oldest royal house in the world. Baron di Francisci is even richer than his fiancee, and takes an active interest in the life of his country. Added to these is the fact that he belongs to the oldest Neapolitan nobility, all of which make him [illegible] in that country. [illegible] Count Primoli, when [illegible]



HAPPENINGS IN THE CITIES

Woman Routs Two Burglars in Home

CLEVELAND, O.—When Mrs. Timothy Clancy, 7713 Superior avenue, returned to her home early the other morning from a call upon friends in the neighborhood she found the front door jammed so she could not unlock it. Glancing through the dining-room window she saw two burglars at work.

She didn't scream or run. She calmly proceeded to raise the dining-room window and just as calmly proceeded to climb in. The burglars fled.

The burglars chose a rear door for their exit, brushing by Mrs. Clancy's mother, Mrs. Catherine Carpenter, and her sister, Mrs. Arthur Dowe, who had run around to the back when Mrs. Clancy started to climb into the window. The burglars kept right on going, however, and disappeared over the alley fence. They took $665 worth of loot with them.

The apartments of Mrs. Clancy are located on the first floor of a four-suite terrace. Mrs. Dowe occupies the suite opposite the one occupied by Mrs. Carpenter and Mrs. Clancy. The three women had been out together.

When Mrs. Clancy attempted to open the front door she was surprised to find that the key would not turn. She next observed that the lights within the apartment were all burning, though she had turned them off when leaving.

Mrs. Clancy borrowed a chair from a neighbor and climbed to the dining-room. As she raised the window she saw the two men inside. "I was not a bit frightened," said the brave little woman. "I am sorry now that I made so much noise in opening the window, because I might have got in and grabbed one of them. I know I could have held onto him until the neighbors came to my assistance."

The apartments had been most thoroughly searched. Rugs and mattresses were turned over. Drawers were pulled out and their contents scattered about. Clothing was removed from the closets and pains were taken to turn the pockets inside out. The thieves carried away six rings set with diamonds, two gold-mesh bags and other articles valued at $500. They also found $165 in cash.

Eight Women Lunch With Eight Dogs

NEW YORK.—A history-making social event took place the other afternoon at the Vanderbilt hotel.

As the Chinese clock in the Chinese room struck two, there sat down to luncheon eight Chinese doggies and eight American women. Yes; together—a lady and a dog, a lady and a dog, alternately, all round the table.

It took some effort on the part of Mrs. Arthur L. Holland, who gave the party for her Pekinese, Vi-Sin of Alderbourne, to persuade the manager to close the Chinese room to the public for the afternoon and insure seclusion for her aristocratic gathering.

Pink, red and yellow carnations decorated the oblong table, and between each teakwood chair was placed a teakwood tabouret inlaid with pearl and cushioned with satin, upon which a well-combed doggie sat.

Mrs. Holland denied that she was the hostess. The luncheon, she declared, was being given by Vi-Sin of Alderbourne to his friends from Peking, who were allowed to bring their beautiful mistresses to share the banquet.

Besides Vi-Sin, there was Toto, Mme. Wu, Wu Ting Fang, Pin-Kee, Ti-Tu Ehr-sin and Fah-Sin, who accompanied respectively Mrs. William Shannon, Mrs. William E. Belding, Mrs. A. Radcliffe Dugmore, wife of the celebrated African explorer; Mrs. Carl E. Ackley, who accompanied her husband on a two-year African hunting expedition and personally shot the largest elephant ever killed; Mrs. Edward Woodward, Miss Hattie Wood and Miss Doonja de Mitkiewicz-Holland, a daughter by Mrs. Holland's former marriage to a Russian nobleman, the Count de Mitkiewicz.

Vi-Sin's costume consisted of a knot of pink roses at his collar, matching in tint Mrs. Holland's gown. The place-cards were small dull-finished photographs of the host himself, taken in a variety of poses.

One Million Stray Cats in Chicago

CHICAGO.—There are 1,000,000 homeless cats in Chicago.

Herein lies a problem that soon must be given serious consideration, in the opinion of Hugo Krause, secretary of the Anti-Cruelty society.

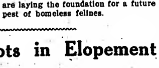
As Constantinople collected all its stray dogs and placed them upon an island in the Mediterranean, there to starve to death, so Chicago must devise some plan of ridding itself of the half-starved felines that infest every alley and practically every building in the older portions of the city and are found in hundreds in the basements of loop buildings.

The Anti-Cruelty society has no means with which thoroughly to perform the task. Officials of the dog pound are said to have refused to undertake it because of the old superstition that the exterminator of a black cat will ever after be unlucky.

Only a few days ago a large downtown restaurant was renovated. In the cellars nearly two score of stray cats were found. Thirty-five of them were sent to the Humane society which maintains a large cattery, sorts out the best of the felines and finds homes for them and chloroforms the remainder.

According to statistics one female stray cat will bring from ten to fifty kittens into the world each year. Throughout the entire city the cat population is increasing rapidly and even in the newer districts owners of pet cats, in giving kittens to their friends, are laying the foundation for a future pest of homeless felines.

Little Indiana Tots in Elopement



INDIANAPOLIS.—Elopement! There was no other construction the officers at headquarters could put on it. And they remarked laughingly that the leap-year spirit is geting some pretty young recruits, when they had seen to it that Miss Opal Johnson, three years old, and J. P. Grady, four years old, had been sent home, winding up a runaway that had been suggested by Miss Opal.

After the youngsters had been taken to headquarters by Patrolman Thomas O'Brien, who found them, Matron Whitman administered a diminutive and much-moderated "third degree." She found finally that Miss Opal was the granddaughter of Kale Johnson, and that J. P. was the son of Jack Grady, who was called up.

Miss Opal admitted, under fire, that she and J. P. was sent by J. P.'s mamma to det some buttamilk to dink.

And then she waxed more confidential: [illegible] buyed some apples [illegible] 'em, 'n den I say, J. P., let's wun away. An' we wunned away 'n et some more apples that a big man gived us. An' den we have lots of fun lookin' at de funny men 'n ladies. An' by-'n-by we wants to go home, but we's lostad, and I c'ys and J. P. c'ys 'n a big man tums up and say: 'You losted?' An' J. P. say yes 'n den we dets on a street tar wif the big man and he takes us here."

J. P. sat by gravely and listened while his enticer told her story, which he corroborated by saying:

"I dot an order," producing a slip of paper on which was written a request to "give J. P. some buttermilk."

The youngsters were "bailed out" later by J. P.'s father.

MEN AND WOMAN'S CLOTHES.

It may be laid down as a general rule that the ordinary man never knows when a woman's dress fits or not—unless, of course, it is an extraordinary misfit. His replies to inquiries on that point are, as practically all husbands will attest, based on what he thinks the woman thinks of it. When a wife, for instance, comes into the room wearing a new dress, with a smile on her face, and turns around several times and asks him what he thinks of the fit, he replies without hesitation that it is all right—that he likes the pattern exceedingly and that he doesn't think he ever saw her wear anything more becoming. If, on the contrary, she comes in with corrugated brows and inquires in a distinctly dissatisfied tone what he thinks of the dress, he instantly remarks that, though it looks fairly nice, yet there is still something about it that he doesn't like. He can't say exactly what it is that seems out of kelter, but there is certainly something wrong with that dress and it ought to be altered at once. But it is only just to the men to say that their ignorance of what constitutes the fit of a dress is paralleled by the feminine inability to realise what goes to make up a well-fitting suit for a male person. As a rule, a woman's advice with respect to a man's suit is the most dangerous thing a man can take.

To some, each new spring comes with the freshness of a first one, and there is an evanescent charm about it which no other season possesses. It is a long series of progressions, beginning with the first soft southern breeze, the melting of the snow and the earliest warble of the pioneer blue bird, a tiny patch of sky flown down to earth, the unlocking of mountain streams, the soft pussy willow buds and the twilight piping of frogs. There is premonition and expectancy in the air. Then, with alternating showers and sunshine, the dreary-looking earth takes on little by little a fresh robe of verdure, pale green at first, half hiding the skeleton outlines of the trees and wrapping the landscape in a misty dream of beauty. There are varying shades; here and there where there are oaks, splotches of brownish purple, and along the hillsides great masses of blossoms, dogwood and judas tree and billowy reaches of white and pink orchards. All along the way in dooryards are white and purple lilacs loading the air with fragrance, and the fields are spangled with golden dandelions.

That men of wealth in increasing numbers are deserting the ranks of "the idle rich" and devoting their time, talents and a part of their money to useful public service, is one of the encouraging fruits of democracy in this country. The charge has often been made that very wealthy men do not bear their just proportion of the public burdens, and possibly many of them do not. Possibly many of them lack a sense of responsibility. During the past quarter of a century, however, there have been in American public life, or in semi-public life, a great number of men who feel that riches, as well as noblesse, oblige, says the Boston Globe. It would be a superfluous task to enumerate them—the men in whom a social conscience has been developed and who find the performance of public duties more attractive than polo or golf.

The courts and the imperious ruler by divine right do not always pull together, as appears from a case in Germany, where a tenant of the emperor sued his landlord and won in two courts. There was a precedent for this in the reign of Frederick the Great, who wanted to remove a mill that spoiled his view from Sans Souci, but the courts upheld the sturdy miller through a controversy which Carlyle celebrates over several pages. Still such things occur infrequently enough in Germany to get into print when they do happen.

It has been decided by a Chicago judge that the earning capacity of a performing monkey is $300 a week. If it is impossible for one to be a ball player one may still be a performing monkey.

A Boston clergyman says that American women wear too many clothes at summer resorts. Either he has never been at a seaside resort or another church trial is imminent.

There have been several cases lately of doctors being sued for sewing up surgical supplies in the bodies of their patients. Perhaps, after all, a trust to raise the prices of doctors' outfits would not be a bad thing.

A Chicago boy fell from a fourth-story window and struck on a cement sidewalk without being seriously injured. This may be regarded as a strong recommendation for cement sidewalks.

GOMEZ ASSURES U. S. GOVERNMENT HE WILL QUELL CUBAN REBELLION IN THAT TIME.

OSTERHAUS PAYS HIM VISIT

Minister Beaupre Having Hard Time in Havana—Three Battles Are Fought in Santiago Province—Two Rebel Leaders Slain.

Washington, June 14.—Assurance has been given to the United States government by President Gomez that the revolt in Cuba will be put down within the next ten days.

President Taft received this assurance on Wednesday from Rear Admiral Hugo Osterhaus, commander-in-chief is now in Havana harbor. Admiral Osterhaus, in a message to the state department, said that President Gomez gave his assurance when he (Osterhaus) paid the president of Cuba an official visit.

The naval commander reported also that President Gomez had expressed himself as gratified over the reception accorded Senor Ferrara, the speaker of the Cuban house of representatives, who is now in Washington.

Coincident with Admiral Osterhaus' statement comes reports from Cuba that Arthur M. Beaupre, United States minister to Cuba, is persona non grata. His recall, according to the state department, has not been asked.

Officials of the state department admit that Minister Beaupre is having a hard time in Havana, but they assert it is due to the disturbances.

EIGHT ARE MURDERED

WHOLE FAMILY BRUTALLY SLAIN IN IOWA HOME.

Four Children, With Their Parents and Two Girl Visitors, Killed by Unknown Assailant.

Villisca, Ia., June 12.—An unknown assassin wiped out an entire family here on Monday by foully slaying eight persons while they slept at the Moore home.

The dead: Joseph B. Moore, Mrs. Joseph B. Moore, Herman Moore, eleven years old; Catherine Moore, nine years old; Boyd Moore, seven years old; Paul Moore, six years old; Lena Spillinger, aged fourteen; Ina Spillinger, aged nine.

The Spillinger girls were daughters of Joseph Spillinger, a well-to-do farmer, who were guests of the Moores.

All eight were found dead in their beds with their heads literally smashed into a jelly. The ax used in the terrible execution was found in an upstair room, where the murderous visitor probably did his last work. The ax is one that belonged to Mr. Moore.

Mr. and Mrs. Moore and their four children occupied the lower part of the house and the Spillinger girls were sleeping in an upstairs room.

The vicinity of Villisca is patrolled by members of the Villisca militia company. In common with officers all over southwestern Iowa, they are looking for John Vangilder of Omaha, divorced husband of Mrs. Moore's sister, who is suspected of some knowledge of the crime. He is reported to have been seen in Villisca Saturday.

The position of the bodies show that there was no struggle and that they were slain as they slept.

Chicago, June 15.—The national committee on Thursday awarded Colonel Roosevelt eight delegates in the Republican convention delegate contest fight. On the day's total Taft again was the leader, getting 12 from Mississippi and six from Missouri, 18 in all, while Roosevelt was conceded eight from Missouri and two from North Carolina, making ten; the total for Taft being 159 and that of Roosevelt 11.

A compromise was effected in Missouri after Roosevelt, by a unanimous vote, received the four delegates-at-large, headed by Governor Hadley. The compromise gave Roosevelt four and Taft six of the ten contested delegates.

The compromise followed two conferences of contending factions. As the Missouri delegation of 36 stands now, Roosevelt has 20 and Taft 16.

Roosevelt's gain in Missouri was followed with another credit in North Carolina. The two contesting delegations from the Third North Carolina district were for Roosevelt and the committee seated Marion Butler and W. S. Robinson, giving the colonel a total credit for the day of ten votes. The one from Kentucky given him makes the Roosevelt total 11. This ended the day's work.

TAFT DENOUNCED IN HOUSE

Washington, June 15.—President Taft was denounced on the floor of the house Thursday for spending money appropriated for traveling expenses on "political jaunts during which he condemned all persons not thinking like himself." The denunciation was delivered by Representative Fitzgerald of the appropriations committee during the debate on the sundry civil bill, which contained an item of $25,000 for the traveling expenses of the president. The house finally, by a vote of 78 to 51, decided to retain the item.

The house indulged in five hours of debate of the bitterest kind over the conference report on the army appropriation bill, which finally was passed by a vote of 121 to 92. The conference report contains two amendments, one providing for a commission to decide whether army posts should be abolished and the other automatically legislating Maj. Gen. Leonard Wood out of office as chief of staff in March next.

Announcement Is Made That Gov. Harmon Will Not Accept Second Place on Ticket.

Baltimore, Md., June 15.—National Chairman Norman Mack of the Democratic national committee and Secretary Urey Woodson arrived here on Thursday from New York and have formally opened the headquarters of the national committee. Several national committeemen and local politicians were present, and the first real gathering of leaders in the preconvention session was held.

Reports that Chairman Mack would retire as head of the committee were not credited by national committeeman, who say that his retirement is a question that lies mainly between the presidential candidate and Mr. Mack. The chairman has not indicated to his friends what he proposes to do.

Mr. Mack said that O'Gorman, James, Kern or Parker would make acceptable temporary chairman, but nothing definite will be done in the selection of that important factor until committee of arrangements meet.

National Committeeman Daniels' plan to make the second man on the final presidential ballot the candidate for vice-president was met with an authoritative announcement that for Gov. Judson Harmon's part, he would not accept a second place on the ticket. Edmond H. Moore of Ohio, one of Governor Harmon's chief lieutenants, said: "I can say positively that Governor Harmon would not take second place should be by any possibility fail of the main nomination."

It was also announced that Edwin Henderson of Detroit would make a speech seconding Governor Harmon's nomination.

Plans were made to bring the headquarters of Speaker Champ Clark to this city either the last of this week or the first of next week.

National Committeeman Edwin O. Wood of Michigan said that his delegation is made up of Harmon, Wilson, Clark and Underwood men.

RHEUMATISM A DISEASE OF THE BLOOD

The Treatment Which Is Most Successful Is Directed Toward Building Up and Purifying the Vital Fluid.

That rheumatism is a disease of the blood is shown by the fact that it is hereditary in certain families, and that there is a marked thinning of the blood immediately following its attack.

In the following brief statement are described symptoms which every patient will recognize and the means by which a cure was effected in this case is described with equal fidelity.

If you are suffering from any form of rheumatism with loss of flesh and strength, and thinning of the blood, the remedy that was so effective here deserves a thorough trial.

"About fifteen years ago," says Mrs. Rhoda Pettit, of Louisville, Neb., "after exposure to dampness and wet and being in a run-down condition from overwork, I began to suffer from inflammatory rheumatism. Both my father and mother were sufferers from the same disease. My right side was afflicted and had I no use of my right limb. The cords of the limb seemed to be drawn up. Often the pains would shift from one part of the body to another and, while they were worse in my right limb, they were very severe through the small of my back. There was a sensation as though I was being cut with a knife. My limbs and feet were swollen so that I could not put on my shoes. I suffered intense agony all of the time and when the attacks were severe I was confined to bed for weeks. My stomach was in bad shape. I was troubled with heartburn and gas. I lost weight and my strength was all gone.

"I took medicine from a doctor and tried several other remedies and liniments but nothing helped me until I tried Dr. Williams' Pink Pills. I had taken them only a short time before I could feel the new blood and after a fair trial I was able to walk. The pills made me a strong, healthy woman and I am entirely cured of the rheumatism. I know I would not be living today if I had not tried Dr. Williams' Pink Pills."

Dr. Williams' Pink Pills are sold by all druggists, or sent, postpaid, on receipt of price, 50 cents per box; six boxes for $2.50, by the Dr. Williams Medicine Company, Schenectady, N. Y. The genuine are sold only in packages bearing the full trade-mark.

Zeke Knew Rufe.

Rufe was telling Zeke about a terrible escapade he had had the night before after he had crossed the dam at the river and was making for his cabin about a half mile through the dark woods.

"And jest as I stepped intor de brush I hears a funny noise like a ghost snortin'. I looks up an' a blue light jumps out er de gronn' and shapes itself into a ghost about six foot tall. Red fire was a-flickerin' out er its nose. It stood still kinder, then lifted a long, bony finger an' says: 'I want you, Rufe Jackson.'

"I walks up to it and shakes my own finger right in its face. 'You mind yore business and I'll mind mine,' I says, and turns on my heel and goes right on.

"Now, what'd you er done, Zeke, in a case like dat?"

"I'd er done jest what you done you durned lying nigger."

For regulation of the stomach and bowels you will find Garfield Tea very beneficial.

RECORD OF A GREAT MEDICINE

Hooper, Nebraska.—"I am very glad to tell how Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound has helped me. For five years I suffered from female troubles so I was scarcely able to do my work. I took doctors' medicines and used local treatments but was not helped. I had such awful bearing down pains and my back was so weak I could hardly walk and could not ride. I often had to sit up nights to sleep and my friends thought I could not live long. At my request my husband got me a bottle of Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound and I commenced to take it. By the time I had taken the seventh bottle my health had returned and I began doing my washing and was a well woman. At one time for three weeks I did all the work for eighteen boarders with no signs of my old trouble returning. Many have taken your medicine after seeing what it did for me. I would not take $1000 and be where I was. You have my permission to use my name if it will aid anyone."—Mrs. SUSIE TEMPLETON, Hooper, Nebraska.

The Pinkham record is a proud and peerless one. It is a record of constant victory over the obstinate ills of woman—ills that deal out despair. It is an established fact that Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound has restored health to thousands of such suffering women. Why don't you try it if you need such a medicine?

PARKER'S HAIR BALSAM [illegible]

HEARD ON THE SKIRMISH LINE OF THE REPUBLICAN NATIONAL CONVENTION

Somebody during the course of an interview always thinks to ask that crazy question:

"How do you expect to put in your time, Mrs. So and So, while you are attending the convention?"

And the interviewed usually tries to frame up some elaborate reply. The question was duly put up to Mrs. William E. Borah, wife of the senator from Idaho, on her arrival, and right off the bat she said:

"The first thing I mean to do is to straighten up this room. I thought I'd try to make it look as if a woman ever saw it. You never saw such a looking place as it was when I got in. Papers—papers everywhere; and books! I'm always afraid to move one far, for if I do Mr. Borah can't find it.

"I was in California and he telegraphed me to come to be with him. Well, I haven't seen him but about ten minutes. I think he forgot I was here. He went down to the barber shop this morning and I went down to meet him for breakfast. We came together in Peacock alley, and I don't think he recognized me. I stepped up to him and he looked at me as much as to say, 'Where have I seen her before?'"

Looking for Taft Money.

He took his stand in the middle of the Congress hotel lobby and began offering to wager money on Roosevelt's chances of nomination. He wanted to bet any figure, from $1 up to $50,000.

Major Dunphy isn't a delegate to the convention. He simply is a Roosevelt advocate at large.

"I'd like to bet this roll on Colonel Roosevelt's chances of being nominated and elected," said the major, exhibiting the interior of a pocket that might have been a section of a subtreasury.

The interviewer suggested that he might be prevailed upon to take a little if the bet was broken up into car fare lots.

"Say, this is no joking matter," said the indignant Roosevelt man. "I came all the way from Topeka to lay a small wager on the colonel and I am going to find some backer of the president with sand enough to take it."

So he stumped away in high dudgeon.

No Photos for Niedringhaus.

Thomas K. Niedringhaus of Missouri has a great antipathy for photographers in general and newspaper photographers in particular.

"No, sir, I will not stand for my photograph," he said to a group of pleading photographers. "Photos are worse than sketches and anybody knows I don't want one of them. What's that? Been snapped while I was talking to you? Say, let me out of here. You're too many for me."

Thayer's Mountain Lion.

A new one has been uncovered about Colonel Edward Thayer of Indianapolis, assistant sergeant-at-arms at the Coliseum. The colonel had a near adventure with a near mountain lion, and, take it from him, it was a thriller.

"Colonel Ed" has a bungalow in Arizona. He started for the woodhouse one evening to get a back log for his fire. Here's the rest of the story, as he tells it:

"When I got to the shanty I started to feel around for the lock on the thing. I put my hand on something that was alive. Every hair on my head stood straight up and I don't know now why I didn't let loose a yell that could be heard in Maine.

"I thought of mountain lions first—then panthers, wildcats, wolves and, in fact, everything in the wild west chased itself through my mind.

"Next morning I went out to see what kind of tracks that monster had left. The tracks were there. So was the monster. It was an innocent little burro that had crowded close to the shed out of the rain."

Envies Chicago Policemen.

"I can't think of anything that I would like to do more than to be a policeman in Chicago." Mrs. Sarah P. Bond of Oklahoma City, where she has been police matron, patrolman and deputy sheriff and had a uniform, too, made this wish from a fund of experience. She is here to attend the Republican national convention, though not a delegate. She fears that the proposed suffrage plank will never be nailed on the platform.

"We have to get suffrage," she insisted. "It's the first wedge for redemption."

Mrs. Bond has been police matron and deputy sheriff in Oklahoma City three times. The first time was when it was a fierce young town.

"Then they had ninety-three saloons, and killed their man daily," she said.

"The Republican party ought to know," said Mrs. Bond, "that the party that gives women the votes is the coming party."

Governor Stubbs Stumped.

Governor Stubbs was remarking on the serious nature of the crime of delegate stealing.

"Why, don't you know that it's as bad as stealing horses," said the governor.

"But don't you know that it was Colonel Roosevelt who invented the steamer roller?" asked [illegible] "Don't you know that he [illegible] all the [illegible]

Study in Headgear.

Anybody interested in the sort of headgear that may be found in the ring about the Congress hotel headquarters will find an interesting study in examining the thatch coverings that adorn the heads that bob about there in the course of a day.

Colonel New wears a broad soft hat that bespeaks the importance of the position he is occupying at the present moment. Nobody could miss him if told to look for that hat. Governor Stubbs may be found beneath a funny little white felt hat that is not at all like the sort of covering one would expect to find protecting a state executive.

There are at least twenty Texan sombreros, each having exactly the same kind of a little strap around them and the same kind of a brown and be-mustached face beneath them. Also, there is Colonel Younger, from Alabama, whose hat looks as belligerent as its owner. It falls off every time he opens his mouth, which is about as often as any self-respecting person would desire to lose his hat.

Deserted Wives Retaliate.

Much dissatisfaction is expressed by the wives of politicians here assembled for the convention, because they haven't seen their husbands for two weeks.

"What do you think of such and such a measure, Mrs. Hayward?" asked some one of the pretty young women in her big suite overlooking the lake.

"Gracious me, I haven't seen my husband since that came up. Don't come to me for any news of the convention. When I hear it it will be stale indeed."

In retaliation the women have instituted what might be mildly called a boycott. They have appropriated the machines rented by the politicians for their stay in Chicago, and have scattered to the four winds. Mrs. William Hayward, in the temporary family car, took her small son, Leland, to the South Shore country club for the day and evening. Mrs. Victor Rosewater went on a sightseeing tour from nine in the morning until well beyond dinner time. The latest seen of David Mulvane he was wondering wildly where his wife was. Mrs. Joseph Kealing went out into the suburbs, "where she would have some one to talk to—it was lonely to be alone in a big hotel."

Mrs. Joseph Dixon and her large family had no complaint to offer and remained "on the job." She and the little Dixons, including two-year-old Betty and Mary Joe, who is five, entertained the reporter for more than an hour. It was extraordinarily fine entertainment, too, and led to the formulation of an axiom, "Simpler is it to manage a presidential campaign than to bring up one Mary Joe."

Selects His Own Portfolio.

The secretary of agriculture has already been picked. No others need apply.

G. R. Werner of Brewster, Kan., is to be the man. He also says he is the only man that can fill the place.

"I am confident that Colonel Roosevelt will be nominated," he said, "and after he is I shall take the stump for him. My work will have a telling effect. When I go out for a man it means a whole lot to him. It is not going to cost me anything, for the common people, I am confident, will be willing to pay all my expenses, for they will want me in the cabinet. There is no one can fill the place and do it right except me."

Green and Orange Decorations.

"An Irishman picked it!"

That's the never-failing exclamation when a Republican convention delegate enters the holy of holies where the national committee sits.

By "it" he means the color scheme. Green walls, green matting, green furniture, green palms and ferns are seen, and last, but by no means least, the green-bound lists of contests.

All but the ceiling. That's orange.

"That son of Erin must have come from the north country," was the caustic comment made by one Irish delegate. "The idea of picking green and orange!"

Teddy Hats in Drinks.

"Rough Rider" features in the campaign received an added attraction at the Congress hotel in the shape of a "Teddy Hat" made of orange peel, which was placed in all drinks served in the Pompeian room during the evening. "Look at the 'Teddy Hat' in the lemonade," said one of the Taft followers as he fished the orange peel from the drink. "I guess they will give us 'Teddy hats' in our bread and butter next."

Hat-in-Ring Button Adopted.

The hat-in-the-ring button now worn by Roosevelt adherents has been adopted by Senator Joseph M. Dixon, manager of the Roosevelt campaign, as the official Roosevelt emblem.

The inventor of the button, B. M. Jones of Muskogee, Okla., has followed Colonel Roosevelt through twenty-one states selling the button and is said to be making a fortune.

Kealing Picked the Winner.

Taft headquarters at the Congress hotel resolved itself into a baseball grandstand and occupants devoted themselves to watching an international contest on the lake front.

BUMPER CORN CROP

STATE IMMIGRATION COMMISSIONER MAKES OPTIMISTIC REPORT.

WEATHER GOOD SO FAR

Prophecy Based on Summarized Statements for the Entire State; Seed Limits Acreage.

St. Paul.—H. J. Maxfield, state immigration commissioner, predicts a bumper corn crop for the coming year. Mr. Maxfield itemizes the reports of correspondents, summarizing their reports with statements that a larger acreage of better stock than the average has been planted. Weather conditions so far are characterized as good.

"At present 55 of the June crop reports have been received," says the report, "and without exception every one so far received reports the prospects for crops to be exceptionally good. In some cases, however, the prospects for berries and apples, in certain counties, are not as good as at this time last year, while in other counties, if nothing happens, the crops this year will exceed that of last year.

"None of the reports show a shortage of rain. Nearly every county reports the pastures in excellent condition and much better than at this time last year. Owing to the recent heavy rains, some counties report the roads in rather poor conditions. Others report that much work is being done on them, and that there is a general feeling among the farmers to push the good road work along this year.

"The acreage compares favorably with the government census report, with a slight increase, which naturally follows the rapid development of the formerly uncultivated lands in the northern sections of the state.

"In southern, southwestern and central Minnesota, there is a decided increase in the corn acreage. The corn acreage in many counties would have been even greater this year, had sufficient good seed been procurable. Taking the reports as a whole, I have no hesitancy in predicting a bumper crop for the Minnesota farmers during the season of 1912."

Reports of Counties.

Watonwan—Berries are fair. Not many apples. Small grains look the best in the history of the county and corn is coming fine.

Freeborn—Prospects good for small fruit and plums, but the apple crop will be short. Early May weather little too cool but is warming up and corn is coming up fine, and all small grains are flourishing. The meadows are growing fine with plenty of moisture.

Todd — Good prospects for small fruit and apples, better than it has been for years. General opinion today is that the outlook for a good crop was never better. There is some complaint of cut worms, and they have damaged the vegetable crop to some extent. Weather conditions excellent.

Scott—Berries and plums fair. The apple crop half short. Lots of work is being done on Scott county roads.

Swift—Prospects for fruit good. All grain has taken good root and growing strong. Corn is up and appears to have a good stand.

Cass—Prospects for berries good. All crops looking fine, but little backward on account of late spring. Large acreage of new land being cleared and broken this year.

Fruit Prospects Good.

Wilkin—Prospects for fruit good. Considerable new land being broken this year, which will be sown to flax. Rainfall has been about right this year. Corn needs warmer weather. All small grains are rooted and stooling well. Pastures in splendid condition.

Norman.—Very good prospects for fruit. All crop conditions are the best they have been for years.

Anoka.—Apple trees did not come out as usual, but there will be about two-thirds crop. Plums will be full crop. Strawberries, blueberries and raspberries will be good. All crops looking fine with the exception of rye. This is a potato county. Some fields are 12 inches high now and have a good color. Clover looking fine, about 15 inches high. Will be haying about the 20th of June. Corn looking fine.

Le Sueur. — Apples very light. Plums promise an abundant crop, and berries of all kinds the best in years. Corn looking fine, and other small grains doing well.

Mower.—Prospects never better at this season of the year for all farm laborers than can be supplied. Conditions are ideal as regards the growing crops and we look forward to an excellent crop of everything. Soil conditions were admirably good at time of seeding and planting, some of which is not finished at this writing. However this refers to flax, for which there is plenty of time yet. Have some splendid farms on which we could place some No. 1 renters.

Corn Coming Fine.

Steele.—The prospects for crops are good. Small grains are well rooted and a good stand. Corn coming up fine. Weather conditions have been favorable to grass, hay and pasture.

Hubbard.—Prospects for all kinds of fruit never better. Corn planting late. On the whole, everything looking favorable.

Jackson.—Berries favorable; apples will be a little short. All crops looking fine. Plenty of rain.

Ottertail.—Conditions very favorable in every way. Cold rains have delayed corn planting, but corn is just commencing to come up and as most of the seed used was locally grown, the delay will not be of much injury.

Traverse.—Prospects for all crops are good. Corn is a little late. Small grains of all kinds doing well.

Douglas.—Berries and plums good. A little short on apples. Small grains of all kinds doing fine.

Kittson.—Berries and small fruit, fair crop. Prospects for other crops are extra good. The ground is a little wet and flax planting will be late. We expect to make big road improvements during the year.

Marshall.—Prospects for all crops good, and if nothing happens we will have a bumper crop this year.

Pastures Doing Well.

Aitkin.—Fruit prospects very good. Pastures in splendid condition. A bumper crop almost assured.

Wadena.—All kinds of berries, and the general outlook for excellent crops is good.

Murray.—Apple crop very light. Small fruit better. Prospects for all crops good. Corn a little late on account of scarcity of seed. Never before in this county have farmers tested their seed as they have done this year and with good results.

Itasca.—Fruit prospects very good. Other crop prospects never better. Plenty of rain and the pastures good. Quite a number of settlers coming in. Local creamery doing a good business.

Nicollet.—Apples will be light, because of excessive bearing last year. Small fruit good. Corn planting a little late, because of wet weather, but there is plenty of time for the usual heavy yield. Other crops looking fine.

Roseau.—No spring frost having injured blossoms, prospects for a large yield of berries, apples and plums and other fruit very good. Fields are in excellent condition. The right amount of rain has fallen and indications point to good crops.

Dakota. — Berries, cherries and plums good. Apples somewhat light. Small grains looking fine. Farmers very much encouraged and happy over the crop outlook and general prosperity.

Red Lake.—Small fruit will be a good yield. Apples now in bloom. Winter rye stands from 6 to 12 inches, wheat from 2 to 6 inches high, oats the same. Corn just coming up. All grasses and grains indicate an excellent crop. Pastures extra good. Everything points to an excellent crop this year.

IN HONOR OF APPLE KING.

Native Sons of Minnesota to Dedicate Park to Peter M. Gideon.

Minneapolis.—The Native Sons of Minnesota will dedicate the Gideon Memorial park and tablet marking the Gideon farm, at Manitou, on the old Gideon homestead Saturday, June 15, at 2 p. m., in honor of Peter M. Gideon one of the earliest settlers in Minnesota, and the originator of the Wealthy apple, now known all over the country.

The deed to "Gideon Memorial park," has been presented by O. P. Briggs, present owner of the old Gideon horticultural farm. It is a small triangular bit of ground facing the Tonka Bay road at Manitou Glen, and the lot will be improved, inclosed and cared for by the Native Sons of Minnesota. The dedication services will be attended by nearly 1,000 people and will be under the auspices of the Native Sons and the State Horticultural society which chooses to honor one of its earliest and most distinguished sons. Dr. W. E. Leonard, Charles Ginek and David G. Gorham compose the committee in charge of the ceremonies of presentation and dedication.

Teacher Gets Prison Term.

Minneapolis, Minn. — Fremont L. Smith, school teacher, was convicted of an offense against a 12-year-old girl and sentenced for an indeterminate period of from seven to 30 years in state prison by Judge Dickinson. A motion for 30-day stay of execution was denied. The case was brought first to the attention of the Humane society when neighbors complained that the Smith baby was being neglected. Smith has taught schools at Svea and Janesville, Minn., and Athel and Aberdeen, S. D.

TWO DIE IN DUPLEX FIRE

HALF DOZEN MORE ARE OVERCOME BY SMOKE.

Civil War Veteran Among Those Injured in Minneapolis.—$5,000 Loss.

Minneapolis. — Two persons lost their lives and fully half a dozen more were overcome by smoke in a fire which broke out in the rear of a duplex house early in the morning.

The dead are:

August Swanson, 70 years old, a civil war veteran, overcome by smoke.

Christine Swanson, his wife, jumped from a third story window and died on the way to the city hospital in the police ambulance.

The fire caused a loss of $5,000 through smoke and water.

VOTERS NEGLECTFUL.

Less Than One-third of Potential Electorate Casts Ballots in Election.

St. Paul. — The potential voting strength of Minnesota as shown by the returns of the thirteenth census taken in 1910, according to statistics issued by Director Durand of the bureau of the census, Department of Commerce and Labor, and prepared under the direction of William C. Hunt, chief statistician for population in the census bureau, is 642,669. The figures represent males more than twenty-one years old living in this state in 1910, excluding the foreign born who have not become naturalized, but does not represent the actual number of voters. It represents, rather, the number of males who from standpoint of age alone are eligible to vote, aside from any qualifications based upon education, length of residence, or considerations of a like nature imposed by the national or state government.

These figures, compared with the election returns of the number of votes cast in 1910 for the gubernatorial candidates, show that less than one-third of the potential voting strength as compiled by the census bureau took advantage of their privilege to vote. The number of votes cast for the five candidates for governor in Minnesota in 1910 was 295,627.

The potential voting strength of St. Paul, according to the same table, is 72,073. The number of registered voters in this city in 1910, according to figures gathered by the secretary of state, was 31,601, showing that less than one man out of two in this city qualified to vote in that year availed himself of the opportunity.

There are 135,494 more than twenty-one years old in Minnesota of native parentage, 298,127 of foreign or mixed parentage, 179,187 foreign who have become naturalized; 119,095 foreign, not naturalized, 6,266 negroes and 2,288 Indians, Chinese, Japanese and other Asiatics. The figures for St. Paul for males more than twenty-one years old are 19,559 of native parentage, 22,832 of foreign or mixed percentage, 17,071 foreign born not naturalized, 11,977 foreign not naturalized, 1573 negroes and 61 Indians, Chinese, Japanese and other Asiatics.

BACALAUREATE SERMON.

Graduating Class of University of Minnesota Hear Address.

Minneapolis. — Modern religion is aristocratic, not democratic, and the church must become socialized if it is to properly serve its purpose. This was the thought given the graduates of the University of Minnesota by Dr. Theodore G. Soares, professor of homiletics and head of the department of theology at the University of Chicago, in the baccalaureate sermon at the university. Religion is enjoyed by only the privileged few instead of reaching out to the many, according to Dr. Soares, who said that the twentieth century must see a social reconstruction, wherein the lawyer, merchant, professional and business man must take up the work of religion along with the minister to make it apply to the social needs of humanity.

About 2,000 persons in addition to the seniors attended, filling the seats in the gallery and the side sections on the main floor. With the music, "Praise Be to the Father," the graduates, garbed in academic robes, marched in and took up the reserved section fronting the platform.

EJECTED BY MISTAKE.

Minneapolis, Minn.— F. L. Crouley is making a search for witnesses who were in the first balcony of the New Grand theater on the afternoon of March 16, when he was made the unwilling subject of a case of mistaken identity and asked to leave the house. Mr. Crouley said the head usher pointed out to the theater policeman an intoxicated man and asked that he be ejected.

Raise State Rates.

St. Paul.—On and after June 15, Minnesota railroads will discontinue party rates to points in the state and will charge the regular rate of 2 cents a mile. The rule was promulgated by the Western Passenger association, and the members of the Transcontinental association conformed to the agreement. [illegible]

Seven Escape Death.

THE PEEVISH CHILD NEEDS TREATMENT

When a child sulks drowsily, or is fretful, it is usually due to some slight disorder of the digestive organs, and a mild laxative is very often all that is necessary to restore cheerfulness and buoyancy of spirits.

In cases where the use of a gentle, effective laxative stimulant is indicated, many of the best physicians are now prescribing Dr. Caldwell's Syrup Pepsin. This preparation is admittedly the perfect laxative, being mild, yet positive in its action on the bowels, and far preferable to violent cathartics and purgative waters. It is very pleasant to the taste and is an ideal remedy to regulate and strengthen the stomach, liver and bowels. Its easy, natural action makes it especially desirable in the case of children, a dose at bed-time being sure to have the desired result next morning, with no attendant unpleasantness or discomfort.

Dr. Caldwell's Syrup Pepsin is sold by druggists everywhere in 50c and $1.00 bottles. If you have never tried this splendid remedy, write to Dr. W. B. Caldwell, 201 Washington St., Monticello, Ill., for a sample. He will be very glad to send a trial bottle without any expense to you whatever.

Mayor Turnbull of Canton was talking about a statement, made all unconsciously by a Titanic officer, that had been a terrible black eye for the Titanic administration.

"This statement," he said, "reminds me of a little Canton boy.

Willing to Do Square Thing.

Brand Whitlock, who doubles as mayor of Toledo and as a literary man, had a Chicago career. He was a reporter on the old Herald when Pete Dunne and Charley Seymour were his side-kicks. Charley Chapin was one of his city editors.

Chapin is now city editor of the New York Evening World, and this story was told to Whitlock lately by a correspondent who had him under interviewing fire:

A new reporter had been hired on the Evening World, and he went to work on a Wednesday. The pay day on the paper is Thursday. In the course of a week, when the recruit received his first envelope, he found that he was a day short. He went to Chapin and complained, only to get this:

"Oh, well, never mind. When I fire you, I'll fire you a day earlier and that will make it come out even."

OUTDOOR LIFE.

Will Not Offset the Ill Effects of Coffee and Tea When One Cannot Digest Them.

A farmer says:

"For ten years or more I suffered from dyspepsia and stomach trouble, caused by the use of coffee (Tea contains caffeine, the same drug found in coffee), until I got so bad I had to give up coffee entirely and almost give up eating. There were times when I could eat only boiled milk and bread; and when I went to the field to work I had to take some bread and butter along to give me strength.

"I doctored steady and took almost everything I could get for my stomach in the way of medicine, but if I got any better it only lasted a little while. I was almost a walking skeleton.

"One day I read an ad for Postum and told my wife I would try it, and as to the following facts I will make affidavit before any judge:

"I quit coffee entirely and used Postum in its place. I have regained my health entirely and can eat anything that is cooked to eat. I have increased in weight until now I weigh more than I ever did. I have not taken any medicine for my stomach since I began using Postum.

"My family would stick to coffee at first, but they saw the effects it had on me and when they were feeling bad they began to use Postum, one at a time, until now we all use Postum." Name given by Postum Co., Battle Creek, Mich.

Ten days' trial of Postum in place of coffee proves the truth, an easy and pleasant way.

THE SUNBEAM.

BY W. G. HUNT.

RED LAKE TURNED LOOSE.

The Red Lake River is now higher than it has been for the past three years, notwithstanding that the general drouth of the past three years has not been broken and all the swamps of northern Minnesota are now dry. What is the cause of this? That question is easily answered. The lumber companys have removed their log jam from the outlet of Red Lake. We should now think that the subservient tools of the lumber corporations, that have indorse them in this dirty ded, from that U. S Enginrers office at St. Paul, down to the printers devil in the Thief River Falls Times office, would feel proud of their work. Look at the bonds on the city of Thief River Falls, placed there to obtain the power that was held back by this log jam. Look at the carcasses of the millions of fish strung along this river. Look at the damage done the farmers along this river by having this water shut off from their stock and cutting off their ice for summer use.

On June 13th, we wrote the following letter to Major Shunk, at St. Paul:

Sunbeam Minn. June 13, 1912.

Major Shunk, Col. U. S. Engineers. St. Paul Minn.

Dear Sir:

There has been no rain to raise Red Lake River, and it is getting awful high now and the lumber companys are running their logs down. Will you please make a scientific report to account for this for publication in THE SUNBEAM, in view of your former reports that, "that the water in the Red Lake River was not being held back by logs jammed into it." The people want to know about these things and it is your duty to explain them.

Yours Respectfully,
W. G. Hunt,
Pub. The Sunbeam.

SHUNK IS OUT OF TOWN.

On June 15th we received the following reply:

United State Engineers Office
St. Paul Minn, June 14, 1912.

Mr. W. G. Hunt, Publisher of "The Sunbeam"
Sunbeam Minn.

Dear Sir!

Your letter of the 13th, instant was duly received and will be laid before Colonel Shunk on his return to the city about July 10th next.

For and in the absence of Col. Francis R. Shunk, Corps of Engineers. Very Respectfully,
John Wade
Chief Clerk.

Well it got so hot for Shunk that he had to take a vacation, or perhaps he's down to Chicago this week "plugging" for Taft. What we want is a report from him showing that the high water in the Red Lake River is caused by the Red Lake being above its normal level.

Every farmer in northern Minnesota is looking to Congressman Steenerson to make their fight for the repeal of Reciprocity, and we believe he will win for when Halvor gets wound up he is a whole team and the dog under the wagon. But we hope to see the people take enough interest in his re-election so he will not have to spend much time campaigning this year.

We have not much to say on politics this week for it is up to the Republican party to do or die in that Chicago Convention, as we believe that the nomination of Taft means defeat in November.

The Governors New Boat.

It was a smooth political move on the part of governor Eberhart to call a special session of the legislature to pass a state primary law for the nomination of "state officers." It had not ought to take as much brains as some of these rabid county optionists posess to see that with the Lee and Gordon votes divided that Eberhart, the so called Brewers candidate is as sure of getting that republican nomination as he would be if he had it in his vest pocket. But that is the way with some of these great reformers; that talk reform, but it's office they want, and they would not miss a possible chance to get it for all the reforms that they ever preached, and that is what Lee and Gordon are doing this year. But if both of them was not made insane by the yearning of their bowels for office they could not help but see that Eberhart has built them a boat that will dump them both into the sea of oblivion so far from shore that they will forget that they was ever candidates for governor, but his rejoicing will be short lived for he will be sent over the dump to keep them company in November.

Crop prospects are very encouraging in this locality at the present time, which is very gratifying to our farmers who are breaking land for more of the same kind next year. Who would not be a Pennington County farmer?

At about the time the country schools are choosing their candidates for county superintendent, the city fellows begin to get into the game and pick out a candidate, although it is none of their business whatever. Thief River Falls has no more business sticking their nose into the electing of a county superintendent of schools than the farmers have voting in their school meetings to elect a board of Directors for them.

Eberhart had no trouble to dispose of the opposition of Lee and Gordon, who can tell the people after the primaries that they also ran. We have both of their pictures which we are going to have framed to point at and remark: "There is two of the biggest political suckers that was ever in the state of Minnesota." It is either that or they are tools of Eberhart working for his nomination.

We would support either Lee or Gordon for governor but there is no use as long as they are both in the race.

What He Was Tired Of.

Every non-golfer and many golfers too, will have hearty sympathy for the poor little caddie in this story from the New York Tribune. The golfer who was employing him, was playing very badly, and the caddie lay down on the grass at one point and watched him.

When the man had got the ball out of the bunker, he glanced toward the boy.

"You must be tired," he said, "lying down at this time of day."

"I ain't tired of carrying," said the boy, "but I am tired of countin'."

Didn't Have to Obey.

On one occasion Senator Root, accompanied by two friends, a banker and a literary man, were at a theater in Boston. Directly in front of the banker was a man who was asleep and snoring vociferously, much to the annoyance of the trio. Without seeking the assistance of an usher the banker shook the sleeper by the shoulder and awakened him, only to be told to "Go to ——."

"Now sit down," said the senator. "You know you don't have to go there just because he told you to do so."

Ends Hunt For Rich Girl.

Often the hunt for a rich wife ends when the man meets a woman that uses Electric Bitters. Her strong nerves tell in a bright brain and even temper. Her peach bloom complexion and ruby lips result from her pure blood; her bright eyes from restfull sleep; her elastic step from firm, free muscles, all telling of the health and strength Electric Bitters give a woman, and the freedom from indigestion, backache, headache, fainting and dizzy spells they promote. Everywhere they are woman's favorite remedy. If weak or ailing try them. 50c at all Druggists.

cured Mrs. C. C. Gokey, of a stubborn case of heart disease, such as thousands are now suffering with. Read what she says:

"Before I began taking Dr. Miles' Heart Remedy I had been suffering from heart trouble for over five years. I had grown so weak that it was impossible for me to do thirty minutes work in a whole day. I suffered intense pains in my left side and under the left shoulder blade, I could not sleep on the left side, and was so short of breath that I thought I should never be able to take a full breath again. The least excitement would bring on the most distressing palpitation. I had scarcely taken a half-bottle of the Heart Remedy before I could see a marked change in my condition. I began to sleep well, had a good appetite, and improved so rapidly that when I had taken six bottles I was completely cured.

Gone To Join The Majority.

The sad news was received here on Sunday evening of the death of Mrs. Jack Dunn, who died at Thief River Falls on that evening from the after effects of child birth, having given birth to a pair of twin baby girls on Sunday last. At last accounts the babies were both living. Mrs. Dunns folks were of the pioneer settlers in the town of Highlanding and she was a woman who was highly esteemed by all who knew her. She leaves a husband and four daughters to mourn the death of an affectionate wife and a kind mother who will have the sympathy of the entire neighborhood in their bereavement. Funeral Services were held at Thief River Falls, on Tuesday and the remains laid to rest in the cemetary at that place.

All Quiete On Ditch 47.

There seems to be no prospect of anything being done on Ditch 47 this year. Days are drifting into weeks, and weeks into months with the same old "setter" standing at its old location. Of course there is no County Comissioner on this side of the river and it now has the appearance that it is the intention to make monkeys out of the petitioners for this ditch, but they are likely to wake up some day and find some monkeys to deal with that will do some tall scratching. Talk and "wind" don't go on this deal a great while longer, for it is now plain enough to seen that there is no intention to dig this particular ditch. Some people think they are smart and smooth but sometimes they get their feathers ruffled.

What would be your opinion of a man that you had rented your farm to, if he should spend the entire season tinkering on a dam old seeder, then loom up the next spring with another old rattle trap ready to put in another season tinkering? Would you not think it was about time to fire him? There has been efforts made to have all ditches and roads on the north side of the river completed, but it now plainly shows that it is the intention to let all contracts on the south side to sub contractors that can't ditch, but put in their time tinkering old machinery. But maybe they made a mistake in getting Griffith over on this side as he is likely to break the record and dig a ditch

The Wayfarer

By Collin [illegible] Collins

Copyright, 1912, by Associated Literary Press.

Cecily was born for romance. She heted anything that smacked of the commonplace. Hence when she saw Bruce Esmond for the first time, she believed herself madly in love with him.

Bruce was an artist with a leaning toward illustration. He set up his easel one April day on the edge of a newly plowed field, and proceeded to make a sketch of Cecily's father.

Mr. Drake resented not only the impertinence of having himself put in a picture—but in being put in one when he was not dressed in his Sundey best. So he told Bruce Esmond to go elsewhere for his inspiration. Then Cecily interfered.

"Why, father, he paints such lovely things," she said, "just look at those horses."

Drake grudgingly admitted that Remus and Romulus looked well, and compromised on a sketch in which he should be left out.

"You can put in the field and the sky and the horses," he stated generously, "but not me."

Then he went on plowing and Cecily end Bruce Esmond proceeded to get acquainted.

Bruce said the conventional things—that Cecily was too pretty to be buried in the country, that he was tired of city women with their feathers and furbelows, that Cecily rested him end pleased him—all the fascinating compliments that men of his class use to turn the heads of the unsophisticated.

Thus, Cecily believed herself madly in love with him end if it had not been for the Wayfarer she would either have married Bruce to live unhappily ever after, or she would not have married him and would have felt herself broken-hearted.

The Weyfarer came slouching along the road in old clothes, with e fishing creel slung over his shoulder and e rod in his hand. He did not compliment Cecily et all. He simply asked for a glass of water and sat on the stone bench end drank it. He looked very tired end Cecily invited him in. "When father comes home we'll have supper," she said, "and he's always glad to have company."

"What Have You to Say About It?"

The Weyfarer thanked her and, for the first time, he smiled.

Cecily sat by him on the stone bench and chatted of many things. She talked most of Bruce Esmond. "You've heard of him, of course?"

"Yes. He has a promising career before him."

"Oh, I hope so," said Cecily, ardently.

Tho Wayfarer said nothing.

"How long has he been here?" he asked, at last.

"A month," said happy Cecily, "and he's going to stay another month. He wants to get the light of the May moon on the apple blossoms."

"Humph!" said the Wayfarer.

Mr. Drake was very enthusiastic ebout the Wayfarer that night.

"He wants to board here through the fishing season," said the farmer to Cecily. "I don't know, but we might as well let him."

"Of conrse," said Cecily. But when she told Esmond, he raged.

"How can I have any inspiration with him around? I want only you, Cecily."

"But you see father needs the money," said Cecily, gravely. "There's the interest on the mortgage to be met."

Esmond looked at her keenly. "I thought your father owned the farm," he said.

"He does. But there's one mortgage. And times are bad and the crops have failed."

Two weeks later the Wayfarer coming up from the stream stopped behind Esmond's easel. [illegible] to him. "What have you to say about it?" he snarled.

"Something," said the Wayfarer, quietly. "I know your reputation in town, Esmond—and Cecily is too sweet to be hurt by you."

"In love with her yourself?" demanded Esmond.

"Perhaps. But that has nothing to do with the case. You'd better pack up your pictures, and run along home."

"I'll take Cecily with me," said the other.

"I think not," said the Wayfarer, "because when Cecily learns the truth I don't think she will want to go."

"It's a pretty small thing for one man to talk about another."

"Not when the other is using the hospitality of a girl's father to accomplish his own ends. I shall tell Drake what I know of your past. He can decide whether it is necessary to warn Cecily. Personally, I don't believe that Cecily will miss you after you have been away a week. When she really falls in love she will fall in love with a man."

"Like you?"

"At least I can offer clean hands and true and steadfast affection."

The next day the artist went in town.

After his departure Cecily drooped and faded.

"Can it be that she really loved him?" the Wayfarer often asked himself.

He tried in every way to make her happy.

"I'm an old fellow," he said, "but really I know some interesting things."

Cecily began to enjoy the walks with him. He did not talk to her as Bruce had done of the beauty of her eyes and the charm of her smile. But he had a wey of telling her things that were delightful, and as time went on Cecily began to feel that she was in close communion with a wonderful heart and mind.

"You don't paint your pictures," she said one day, timidly. "You tell them."

Such a sweet comradeship as it grew to be! The Wayfarer sent to town, now end then, for books, and once there wes a box of candy, end at another time a wonderful bunch of violets.

"How extravagant!" said Cecily, sniffing the flowers with delight.

"But you like them," said the Wayfarer.

One day Bruce Esmond came back.

"I have a perfect right to come," he said to the Wayferer, "I am free."

"Legally?" wes the question.

"A divorce," said Esmond. "Now I shall marry Cecily."

The anger of the Wayfarer burst out. "You shall not have her," he said. "You will break her heart as you have broken the hearts of other women who have trusted you—you shall not have her."

And just then some one said behind them, "Are you talking about me?" Cecily stood there, looking at them with grave eyes.

It was Esmond who answered her. "He says I shall not marry you," he said. "And probably you think I treated you badly because I wooed you before I was free. But I loved you so much, Cecily. And he—he has nothing but his money."

Cecily looked up at the Wayfarer. "Does he meen—thet—that you are rich?" she asked.

"Yes," said the Weyfarer.

"But you ceme tramping along the road like eny common traveler."

"Because I was tired of the things that riches could bring. I—I wanted other things—like love—Cecily."

Cecily sobbed with her face in her hands.

"Go ewey," she said, "go away, both of you."

But as the Wayfarer went slowly, she cried after him, "Oh, I shall miss our long walks together, and the books."

He turned back. "Why should my money stand in the wey?"

"You deceived me," she said, "and—and if I should say 'yes' now you might think it was because I wented to be rich."

"I should think it was because you loved me," he said.

From the other side of the hedge Bruce spoke bitterly, "It's always wealth that wins."

But Cecily smiled et him.

"He has taught me something that you will never know," she said. "I ask only that we shall be good comrades along the road—wayferers together—until death parts."

John M. Callahan's Story.

John M. Callahan told a story of e friend who had been asked to make e short address on the tariff in Manitowoc.

"It was eight o'clock when he began his speech, and he slowly unfolded the intricacies of the wool schedule, the steel rate and a few others, never noticing the time. At 11:30 he hesitated for a few moments, and said:

"I have made my remarks rather short and perhaps some of you do not fully understand this important subject and wish to ask me a few questions. I will be glad to answer anything you may ask me.

"For some minutes none spoke, and again he asked for questions. Finally an old Irishman in the rear of the hall arose. [illegible]

CHAPTER I.

The Wreck of the Taxicab.

The young woman in the taxicab scuttling frantically down the dark street, clung to the arm of the young man alongside, as if she were terrified at the lawbreaking, neck-risking speed. But evidently some greater fear goaded her, for she gasped:

"Can't he go a little faster?"

"Can't you go a little faster?" The young man alongside howled as he thrust his head and shoulders through the window in the door.

But the self-created taxi-gale swept his voice aft, and the taut chauffeur perked his ear in vain to catch the vanishing syllables.

"What's that?" he roared.

"Can't you go a little faster?"

The indignant charioteer simply had to shoot one barbed glare of reproach into that passenger. He turned his head and growled:

"Say, do youse want to lose me me license?"

For just one instant he turned his head. One instant was just enough. The unguarded taxicab seized the opportunity, bolted from the track, and flung, as it were, its arms drunkenly around a perfectly respectable lamppost attending strictly to its business on the curb. There ensued a condensed Fourth of July. Sparks flew, tires exploded, metals ripped, two wheels spun in air and one wheel, neatly severed at the axle, went reeling down the sidewalk half a block before it leaned against a tree and rested.

A dozen or more miracles coincided to save the passengers from injury. The young man found himself standing on the pavement with the unhinged door still around his neck. The young woman's arms were round his neck. Her head was on his shoulder. It had reposed there often enough, but never before in the street under a lamppost. The chauffeur found himself in the road, walking about on all fours, like a bewildered quadruped.

Evidently some overpowering need for speed possessed the young woman, for even now she did not scream, she did not faint, she did not murmur, "Where am I?" She simply said:

"What time is it, honey?"

And the young man, not realizing how befuddled he really was, or how his hand trembled, fetched out his watch and held it under the glow of the lamppost, which was now bent over in a convenient but disreputable attitude.

"A quarter to ten, sweetheart. Plenty of time for the train."

"But the minister, honey! What about the minister?"

The consideration of this riddle was interrupted by a muffled hobbub of yelps, whimpers and canine hysterics. Immediately the young woman forgot ministers, collisions, train-schedules—everything. She showed her first sign of panic.

"Snoozleums! Get Snoozleums!"

They groped about in the topsy-turvy taxicab, rummaged among a jumble of suitcases, handbags, umbrellas and minor impediments, and fished out a small dog-basket with an inverted dog inside. Snoozleums was ridiculous in any position, but as he slid tail foremost from the wicker basket, he resembled nothing so much as a heap of tangled yarn tumbling out of a work-basket. He was an indignant skein, and had much to say before he consented to snuggle under his mistress' chin.

About this time the chauffeur came prowling into view. He was too deeply shocked to emit any language of the garage. He was too deeply shocked to achieve any comment more brilliant than:

"That mess don't look much like it ever was a taxicab, does it?"

The young man shrugged his shoulders, and stared up and down the long street for another. The young woman looked sorrowfully at the wreck, and queried:

"Do you think you can make it go?"

The chauffeur glanced her way, more in pity for her whole sex than in scorn for this one type, as he mumbled:

"Make it go? It'll take a steam winch a week to unwrap it from that lamppost."

The young man apologised.

"I oughtn't to have yelled at you."

He was evidently a very nice young man. Not to be outdone in courtesy, the chauffeur retorted:

"I hadn't oughta have turned me head."

The young [illegible] what a nice chauffeur [illegible] "Great heavens [illegible]

"It's nuttin' [illegible] [illegible]umb."

[illegible]

The young man whipped out his reserve supply, and in a trice it was a bandage on the chauffeur's hand. The chauffeur decided that the young woman was even nicer than the young man. But he could not settle on a way to say it. So he said nothing, and grinned sheepishly as he said it.

The young man named Harry was wondering how they were to proceed. He had already studied the region with dismay, when the girl resolved:

"We'll have to take another taxi, Harry."

"Yes, Marjorie, but we can't take it till we get it."

"You might wait here all night without ketchin' a glimp' of one," the chauffeur ventured. "I come this way because you wanted me to take a short cut."

"It's the longest short cut I ever saw," the young man sighed, as he gazed this way and that.

The place of their shipwreck was so deserted that not even a crowd had gathered. The racket of the collision had not brought a single policeman. They were in a dead world of granite warehouses, wholesale stores and factories, all locked and forbidding, and full of silent gloom.

In the daytime this was a big trade-artery of Chicago, and all day long it was thunderous with trucks and commerce. At night it was Pompeii, so utterly abandoned that the night watchmen rarely slept outside, and no footpad found it worth while to set up shop.

The three castaways stared every which way, and every which way was peace. The ghost of a pedestrian or two hurried by in the far distance. A cat or two went furtively in search of warfare or romance. The lampposts stretched on and on in both directions in two forevers.

In the faraway there was a muffled rumble and the faint clang of a bell. Somewhere a street car was bumping along its rails.

"Our only hope," said Harry. "Come along, Marjorie."

He handed the chauffeur five dollars as a poultice to his wounds, tucked the girl under one arm and the dog-basket under the other, and set out, calling back to the chauffeur:

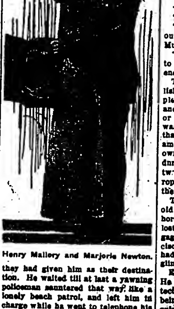
"Good night!"

"Good night!" the girl called back.

"Good night!" the chauffeur echoed. He stood watching them with the tender gaze that even a chauffeur may feel for young love hastening to a honeymoon.

He stood beaming so, till their footsteps died in the silence. Then he turned back to the chaotic remnants of his machine. He worked at it hopelessly for some time, before he had reason to look within. There he found the handbags and suitcases, umbrellas and other equipment. He ran to the corner to call after the owners. They were as absent of body as they had been absent of mind.

He remembered the street number they had given him as their destination. He waited till at last a yawning policeman sauntered that way like a lonely beach patrol, and left him in charge while he went to telephone his garage for a wagon and a wrecking crew.



Henry Mallory and Marjorie Newton.

It was close on midnight before he reached the number his fares had given him. It was a parsonage leaning against a church. He rang the bell and finally produced from an upper window a nightshirt topped by a frowsy head. He explained the situation, and his possession of certain properties belonging to parties unknown except by their first names. The clergyman drowsily murmured:

"Oh, yes. I remember. The young man was Lieutenant Henry Mallory, and he said he would stop here with a young lady, and get married on the way to the train. But they never turned up."

"Lieutenant Mallory, eh? Where could I reach him?"

"He said he was leaving tonight for the Philippines."

"The Philippines! Well, I'll be—"

The minister closed the window just in time.

CHAPTER II.

The Early Birds and the Worm.

[illegible]

Some of the trains were noble equipages, fitted to glide across the whole map with cargoes of Lilliputian millionaires and their Lilliputian ladies. Others were humble and shabby linked-up day-coaches, and dingy smoking-cars, packed with workers, like ants.

Cars are mere vehicles, but locomotives have souls. The express engines roll in or stalk out with grandeur and ease. They are like emperors. They seem to look with scorn at the suburban engines snorting and grunting and shaking the [illegible] roof with their plebeian choo-choo as they puff [illegible] back.

The trainmen take their cue from the behavior of their locomotives. The conductor of a transcontinental nods to the conductor of a shuttle-train with less cordiality than to a brakeman of his own. The engineers of the limiteds look like senators in overalls. They are far-traveled men, leading a mighty life of adventure. They are pilots of land-ships across land-oceans. They have a right to a certain condescension of manner.

But no one feels or shows so much arrogance as the sleeping car porters. They cannot pronounce "supercilious," but they can be it. Their disdain for the entire crew of any train that carries merely day-coaches or half-baked chair-cars, is expressed as only a darkey in a uniform can express disdain for poor white trash.

Of all the haughty porters that ever curled a lip, the haughtiest by far was the dusky attendant in the San Francisco sleeper on the Trans-American Limited. His was the train of trains in that whole system. His car the car of cars. His passengers the surpassengers of all.

His train stood now waiting to set forth upon a voyage of two thousand miles, a journey across seven imperial states, a journey that should and only at that marge where the continent dips and vanishes under the breakers of the Pacific ocean.

At the head of his car, with his little box-step waiting for the foot of the first arrival, the porter stood, his head swelling under his cap, his breast swelling beneath his blue blouse, with its brass buttons like reflections of his own eyes. His name was Ellsworth Jefferson, but he was called anything from "Poarr-turr" to "Pawtah," and he usually did not come when he was called.

Tonight he was wondering perhaps what passengers, with what dispositions, would fall to his lot. Perhaps he was wondering what his Chicago sweetheart would be doing in the eight days before his return. Perhaps he was wondering what his San Francisco sweetheart had been doing in the five days since he left her, and how she would pass the three days that must intervene before he reached her again.

He had Othello's ebon color. Had he have Othello's green eye?

Whatever his thoughts, he chatted gaily enough with his neighbor and colleague of the Portland sleeper.

Suddenly he stopped in the midst of a soaring chuckle.

"Lordy, man, looky what's a-comin'!"

The Portland porter turned to gaze.

"I got my fingers crossed."

"I hope you git him."

"I hope I don't."

"He'll work you hard and cuss you out, and he won't give you even a Much Obliged."

"That's right. He ain't got a valet to carry his things. And he's got enough to fill a van."

The oncomer was plainly of English origin. It takes all sorts of people to make up the British Empire, and there is no sort lacking—glorious or pretty, or sour or sweet. But this was the type of English globe-trotter that makes himself as unpopular among foreigners as he is among his own people. He is almost as unendurable as the Americans abroad who twang their banjo brag through Europe, and berate France and Italy for their innocence of buckwheat cakes.

The two porters regarded Mr. Harold Wedgewood with dread, as he bore down on them. He was almost lost in the plethora of his own luggage. He asked for the San Francisco sleeper, and the Portland porter had to turn away to smother his gurgling relief.

Ellsworth Jefferson's heart sank. He made a feeble effort at self-protection. The Pullman conductor not being present at the moment, he inquired:

"Have you got yo' ticket?"

"Of cawse."

"Could I see it?"

"Of cawse not. Too much trouble to fish it out."

The porter was fading. "Do you remember yo' numbah?"

"Of cawse. Take these." He began to pile things on the porter like a mountain unloading an avalanche. The porter stumbled as he clambered up the steps, and squeezed through the strait path of the corridor into the slender aisle. He turned again and again to question the invader but he was motioned and hunted down the car, till he was halted with a "This will do."

The Englishman selected section three for his own. The porter ventured: "Are you sho' this is yo' numbah?"

"Of cawse I'm shaw. How dare you question my—"

"I wasn't questionin' you, boss. I was just astin' you."

Minnesota Legislature

St. Paul, June 11.—Breaking of the senate "stand pat" slate which was organized at the opening of the special legislative session to shut out all legislation except a state wide primary law and a corrupt practices act, the senate passage of a resolution ratifying the constitutional amendment for the election of United States senators by a direct vote of the people, and the introduction in the house of the Old Congdon re-apportionment bill were the features of an all day session.

The house committee on elections and general legislation put in a busy day attempting to perfect bills up for consideration.

W. A. Campbell succeeded in getting the committee approval of his amendment to the state automobile law, cutting out the provision which required the carrying of lights on horse drawn vehicles.

Frank M. Anderson of the University of Minnesota has asked the legislature to include a provision in the proposed state wide primary law, changing the method of elections of district court judges in Minneapolis. Under the present law, when the terms of two or more judges expire all candidates run at large. Prof. Anderson would designate each office—as Judge No. 1, judge No. 2 and so on.

The senate committee for the reception of bills held its first meeting and recommended for passage the resolution providing for a constitutional amendment allowing the income tax. The resolution has already been passed by the house. Senator Putnam, one of the committee members, said he was opposed to the principle of an income tax, but would vote to have the measure sent to the floor of the senate for consideration. Senators Rockne, Cashman and Boyle, members of the committee, were absent and such action as was taken will be subject to their approval later.

St. Paul, June 12.—Governor Eberhart notified the senate that he was awake and very much on the job. The information came in the form of a message submitted to the upper body. The message was an answer to the request made by the senate last week that the governor submit his recess appointments. The governor comes back with the suggestion the senators would be better engaged in performing the work for which they were called in special session.

The state wide, second choice primary election bill, written by Senator Julius Haycraft and introduced in the senate as an elections committee measure, was passed by a vote of 61 to 1. The bill is a copy of the Wisconsin law with some modifications to suit Minnesota conditions. It contains the elimination feature and is otherwise trimmed.

Senator Dwinnell secured an amendment so the congressman, city and county officials are eliminated from the second choice provision in Minneapolis, thus allowing the use of voting machines for these officers. The regular ballots will be used for state officers. At the request of Senator Dunn the amendment was made to include St. Paul where he said voting machines would soon be in use.

Senator Sageng offered the first amendment, which carried, by which all judges, county superintendents of schools and municipal officers in cities of the first class are to be elected on a separate non-partisan ballot. The latter provision includes the Minneapolis officials. Another amendment, adopted, eliminated the St. Paul officials from the provision of the bill because of the commission form of government decided upon there at the recent city election.

A minor amendment by Senator Haycraft changed the punctuation of the bill in a few places and made provision for ballots to be on the continuous sheet the same as under present election laws. Senator Haycraft then offered a second amendment which was debated for nearly an hour. It was found that the second choice cannot be used in cases where officials are grouped and in some instances where elected at large. Officers affected in this way are supreme court judges, some representatives and district court judges. In order to obviate the difficulty the Haycraft amendment provided that the candidates be required to file in classes.

Senator L. O. Cooke voted alone against the bill on final passage. In explaining his vote he said he thought the second choice feature was ridiculous and that the whole bill would result in the playing of a lot of politics. Senator Handlan was absent. The remaining senators voted for the bill.

Members of the house representatives, who for several days were practically unanimous in their support of the O'Neil bill prohibiting the Modern Woodmen of America from raising its insurance rates in Minnesota without the consent of a majority of its members, have become divided in their positions on the measure, and its passage has become an uncertainty.

A provision in the proposed state wide primary law providing for a non-partisan nomination and election of all officers in the cities of Minneapolis, St. Paul and Duluth and of all judges through the state was adopted by the senate. A similar amendment will be offered in the house by the Hennepin county delegation.

St. Paul, June 13.—Representative Lundeen of Minneapolis introduced a bill in the house of the Minnesota legislature providing for 10 congressional districts in Minnesota, an increase of one. The proposed congressional reapportionment would place Minneapolis in two congressional districts. The proposed reapportionment follows:

First District — Dodge, Fillmore, Freeborn, Houston, Mower, Olmsted, Wabasha, Waseca and Winona counties.

Second—Blue Earth, Brown, Cottonwood, Faribault, Jackson, Martin Murray, Nobles, Pipestone, Rock, Watonwan, Lyon and Lincoln.

Third—Carver, Dakota, Goodhue, Le Sueur, McLeod, Nicollet, Rice, Scott, Sibley and Washington.

Fourth—Ramsey.

Fifth—First, second, third, Fourth, Fifth, Eighth, Ninth, Tenth and Thirteenth wards of Minneapolis and town of St. Anthony.

Sixth—Sixth, Seventh, Eleventh and Twelfth wards of Minneapolis and the remaining township of Hennepin county and the counties of Wright, Anoka, Sherburne, Isanti, Kanabec, Mille Lacs and Chisago.

Seventh — Big Stone, Chippewa, Grant, Kandiyohi, Lac Qui Parle, Redwood, Renville, Stevens, Swift, Traverse, Douglass, Pope and Meeker counties.

Eighth—St. Louis, Lake, Cook, Carlton, Aitkin and Pine.

Ninth — Beltrami, Hubbard, Cass, Itasca, Koochiching, Crow Wing, Wadena, Todd, Morrison, Stearns and Benton.

Tenth — Becker, Clay, Clearwater, Kittson, Marshall, Norman, Otter Tail, Polk, Red Lake, Pennington, Roseau and Wilkins counties.

The house elections committee engaged in a lively debate over the merits of the recall of the judiciary in the Lundeen recall bill and finally by a vote of 12 to 10 decided to strike it out. The bill was then recommended for passage.

The bill as adopted provides for an amendment to the constitution allowing the recall of any officer if a petition signed by a maximum of 33 1-3 per cent of the voters who voted for the office be filed. In this shape the proposed amendment would allow the legislature to fix the actual per cent necessary.

The house sub-committee on re-apportionment sat in judgment to listen to the requests of legislators for changes from the old Congdon bill in their own legislative districts, which would satisfy them sufficiently to draw their vote for the measure when it comes up for final passage in the house.

Practically every request for changes in districts was denied. G. W. Brown succeeded in having Sibley county joined with Scott to make one senatorial district and McLeod county joined with Carver for another. Under the old Congdon bill Carver and Scott counties were joined. He argued that under the new arrangement, railroad facilities through the new senatorial districts would be bettered.

Fillmore county was given two representatives and Houston one. Under the old Congdon bill, three representatives at large were allowed the two counties.

R. C. Dunn succeeded in persuading the house to suspend its rules and pass a bill authorizing cities of the third and fourth class to appropriate money to assist in the building of national guard armories. The bill is a local one, intended to allow the village of Princeton, the home of Mr. Dunn, to build an armory.

Representative Burnquist introduced a bill authorizing the city of St. Paul to issue $600,000 worth of bonds to build a public library. The rules were suspended and the bills passed by a unanimous vote.

In the senate the house bill appropriating $35,000 for the expenses of the extra session was amended on motion of Senator Clague and reduced to $25,000. In this form the measure was passed under suspension of the rules and sent back to the house for concurrence.

The announcement of Edward T. Young, former attorney general, as a candidate for the Republican nomination for governor is expected immediately after the adjournment of the extra session.

THEIR MOST JOYOUS MOMENT

Of the Trio, Probably Representative Redfield Had the Best Occasion to Smile.

The talk in one of the cloak rooms of congress turned to the thought of the happiest moments in one's life. Senator Bailey said his came the day he wore his first pair of trousers. And Paul Howland of Ohio declared his big moment of joy was when he was permitted once to drive a chariot in a pony and dog show parade.

Representative Redfield, who is a wise chap, even if he does hail from Brooklyn, said it was, when he was going to school and trying to master long division. Three or four aisles over from where he sat a boy yawned. It was not an ordinary yawn, but one of such genuine expression of feeling toward things in general that it attracted Redfield's attention. He was fortunate in having a paper wad right at hand, ready for any emergency, and he aimed this at the boy's cavernous mouth. The wad went right square into the goal and—well, Fourth of July fireworks are tame to the stunts that boy did in the next few minutes.

He says he almost smiled once on ship board when the vessel gave a lurch and threw a platter full of beefsteak, gravy and all, over the open-faced shirt front of a pompous passenger across the table.

The Pirates' Cave

By Clara Inez Deacon

(Copyright, 1912, by Associated Literary Press.)

It was thoroughly understood when Miss Nettie Shields, eleven years of age, was permitted to accompany her sister Fanny, of twenty, down to Eagle's nest for a few weeks' stay with their aunt, that the young miss must behave herself.

Not that Miss Nettie Shields had ever been arrested for her conduct, but that she was heedless and overconfident and almost satisfied that she knew it all. If she went out for a walk by herself she would follow a hand organ or a fire engine until she got lost, and if she started for the park to feed the squirrels she might bring up at the Battery to feed the fishes. She had solemnly promised to amend her ways and be no cause of anxiety to anyone, and she stuck to that promise for all of half an hour after arriving at the manor house. Then she met the coachman's son, a lad of twelve.

The city lass was looking at the country lad with her nose in the air and a pitying expression on her face when he walked up to her and said:

"You are not so muchy-much!"

"I am a hundred times more muchy-much than you!"

"Oh, you think so! Did you ever see a pirate's cave?"

"N—no."

"Well, I have. You may have lots of things in the city, but you haven't got a pirate's cave."

"Where is it?"

"That's telling."

"Young man, I want to know at once, and you point out that cave or there'll be trouble!"

"Hu! No kid can bluff me! That cave is full of gold and silver and sparkling jewels. I've seen 'em. I can go there any time and get a bushel. There are also pirate skulls and bones there. There is one diamond as big as my fist. When I heard you was coming down here I thought of taking you over to the cave and letting you pick out a few pearls and rubies for yourself, but now I won't. You are too snippy."

"You Are Not So Muchy-Much!"

"Then you needn't!"

It was three days later that Miss Nettie got down on her knees to that bad boy and vowed to marry him when they grew up if he would take her to that cave. As a matter of fact, he had been told by a boy, who had it from another boy, that there was such a cave in the hills three miles away. He had lied about the rest of it, but he didn't propose to own up. He wanted to be a hero instead of an Uncle Rube, in Miss Nettie's eyes. He soon discovered that he couldn't be without setting out for the cave, and it took him a whole day to make up his mind. They must set out secretly, and if there was no cave a licking awaited him for sure on their return, and it might be bread and water for a week for the girl.

It was not until Miss Nettie had applied the epithet of coward several times that a start was made. The family dog was old and shackelty and didn't care a cent about pirates' caves, but after much coaxing he consented to go along. The way was across the fields and through the scrub to a range of hills, and the afternoon was hot and the journey toilsome. The dog gave out first. When his aged joints began to creak he knew that he had had enough, and he headed back.

"I don't think I'd want to see pirate bones unless the dog was along," observed the boy.

"But I would," was the reply from the panting but not discouraged girl.

"I took the dog so that he could smell out the cave for us [illegible]

"But we'll smell [illegible] selves. We are going [illegible]

"I don't believe there [illegible]

"Oh, yes, there is. I think I have read about it somewhere. If you are a booby you can go back home [illegible]

Forty [illegible] dropped [illegible] home. He wasn't going to give a pirate's ghost a chance to take him by the throat. Miss Nettie missed him, but did not even call on him to return. She had set out for a cave filled with money and jewels, and she meant to reach it.

The hills were reached at last by a very tired girl. They were covered with pine and spruce and bowlders, but after a rest she started her climb and began looking for the mouth of a cave.

The limbs and briars soon made tatters of her dress, but if she thought of the financial damage she realized also that one single ruby of the bushels in the cave would buy her many new suits. No cave! No sign of a cave! A blue-jay now and then, and a chipmunk now and then, and after an hour the girl realised that she was lost and had come on a fool's errand.

The thing to do was to sit down on a rock and have a good cry to try to figure out how many days it would take for a healthy young girl to starve to death. Miss Nettie didn't do the proper thing, however. She sat down, but before the rest of it could follow a hunting dog burst through a tangle and discovered her and began to bark. He had kept it up for two minutes when a man not far away shouted:

"Go for him, Nero! Hold him till I come!"

Nero redoubled his noise, and pretty soon a young man slid down the bank with a crash and came to a halt to exclaim:

"Well, by George!"

"What kind of a man are you to sic your dog on a lost young lady!" was demanded as the girl rose up.

"Why—why, I thought it was a—a woodchuck!"

"But it wasn't, you see!"

His cap came off and he gave his name as Robert Bonham. Miss Nettie could do no less than give her identity and explain how she came to be a Babe in the Woods. She laughed as she talked, and the young man laughed as he listened. He explained that he was also from the city and visiting relatives, and was out on the hills that afternoon for the sake of the tramp.

"Your name is Robert, but I shall call you Bob," said the little girl. "You can call me Net or Nettie. Of course you will see me home?"

"Oh, certainly."

"I want to get at that boy and roll him in the dust."

"Do you know that you are about six miles from the Eagle's Nest?" he asked.

"Mercy on me!"

"It's a mile or more to the house where I am stopping. We will go first and get a bite to eat, and then I will take you home in my auto."

The coachman's boy had returned to hide out, and although Miss Nettie was missed and inquired for he gave no information until dark. Then there was a rumpus. A searching party started out with lanterns, and the women left at home were crying, and it had got to be nine o'clock when the lost girl was driven up by the finder.

In the interval Mr. Bonham was posted on the Shields family, particularly as to Fanny. Miss Fanny had never been in love; she had a sweet disposition; her aunt was going to leave her $20,000; she would make some one an awfully good wife, and a great deal more.

The cave-searcher knew that she had broken her word, and she was conscience-stricken over it. She must do the square thing to pay for the anxiety and trouble she had caused. She did it like a little brick. As soon as released from her sister's arms she introduced Mr. Bob Bonham, and with a lump in her throat added:

"Fanny, I was intending to marry him, for he is all that a trusting girl could ask for, but being I ran away—and got lost—and tore my clothes—and broke my promise—and am going to have a scrap with that boy, why, take him and love him and marry him!"

This speech was embarrassing enough, but had no fatal effects. It was just a year ago, and Mr. Bob Bonham has made such good use of the time that he can now say he is engaged to Miss Fanny Shields.

Court to Thousands.

In New York, for example, upward of two hundred thousand persons were arraigned before the police magistrates in 1910, and another one hundred thousand probably were brought into their courts by summons.

Over this huge army of people, many of whom are entirely innocent of any offense, the magistrates exert an almost undisputed sway; for their decisions are, in nine cases out of ten, absolutely final. In other words, they pass judgment upon the personal liberty and rights of more than twenty-five citizens every month of the year, and save in a few instances their decisions are accepted without appeal or review of any kind. No other tribunal in the land administers justice on so vast a scale, or exerts anything even approaching so unbridled a power. It is at once a court of first and last resort, presided over by a cadi, supreme arbitrator of the facts and largely a law into himself.—Frederick Trevor Hill in the Century Magazine.

ROAD AND FARM IMPROVEMENT

TOAD IS FRIEND OF FARMER

Science Making Efforts to Show Tiller of Soil That Humble Batrachian Should Be Encouraged.

The toad is one of the greatest friends of the American farmer. Science has proven this to be true and is making great efforts to show the tiller of the soil how important it is that the humble batrachian be encouraged in every possible way to multiply and spread over the country.

Farmer's Best Friend.

This little chap who appears so lonely in the open field or in the rear of the stable, is one of the greatest bug fighters in the world. He is prowling around the grass after game and he gets it in vast numbers from the enterprising ant to the lazy slug that crawls slowly from beneath a damp stone.

It is estimated that over $800,000,000 worth of crops are destroyed annually by insect pests. This great sum would be doubled if it were not for the toad and his allies, who keep up a constant warfare against the encroaching bug and worm, that are cheating the farmer out of his just profits as surely as the middleman is doing in the cities.

It is estimated that the average toad is worth at least five dollars a year to the farmers, as the creature during that period has destroyed insects and thus saved crops that are worth that amount. A large toad has been known to devour 100 rose beetles at a single meal. In the stomach of one toad, 75 myriapods were found; in another, 55 army worms and another 65 gypsy-moth caterpillars. At another post-mortem it was shown that the batrachian had just lunched upon 37 ants, 19 sowbugs, 3 spiders, 1 caterpillar and 10 plant lice. At another time one toad was seen to eat 35 large and full grown celery worms in three hours, while another accepted 86 flies, fed to him in less than 10 minutes.

EXHIBITS AT ROAD CONGRESS

An interesting exhibit at the American Road congress to be held next fall will be presented by the United States department of agriculture. Secretary Wilson of the department has authorized Director Logan Waller Page of the office of public roads to give a complete exhibit of the government's work on the public roads of the country, showing how unimproved roads hurt the farmer and how improved roads aid not only the farmer, but the consumer.

Four of the biggest associations which are working for the improvement of public roads are consolidating their forces in order to make the next American Road congress the biggest affair of its kind in the history of this country; they are the American Road Builders' association, the American Association for Highway Improvement, the American Automobile association, and the National Association of Road Material and Machinery Manufacturers. All of these associations have previously held separate conventions. It is expected that farmers' associations and other associations interested in the improvement of public highways will likewise take part in the congress.

This invention relates to the laying of pipes or hollow tiles in ditches, and its object is to provide a new and improved ditching machine and tile distributer, arranged to readily form a ditch in the ground and to place the tiles or pipes into the bottom of the ditch for convenient forming of the tiles or pipes to form a line of such tiles or pipes. The accompanying illustration is a longitudinal central section of the machine and distributer.

ECZEMA DISFIGURED BABY

"Our little boy Gilbert was troubled with eczema when but a few weeks old. His little face was covered with sores even to back of his ears. The poor little fellow suffered very much. The sores began as pimples, his little face was disfigured very much. We hardly knew what he looked like. The face looked like raw meat. We tied little bags of cloth over his hands to prevent him from scratching. He was very restless at night, his little face itched.

"We consulted two doctors at Chicago, where we resided at that time. After trying all the medicine of the two doctors without any result, we read of the Cuticura Remedies, and at once bought Cuticura Soap and Ointment. Following the directions carefully and promptly we saw the result, and after four weeks, the dear child's face was as fine and clean as any little baby's face. Every one who saw Gilbert after using the Cuticura Remedies was surprised. He has a head of hair which is a pride for any boy of his age, three years. We can only recommend the Cuticura Remedies to everybody." (Signed) Mrs. H. Albrecht, Box 883, West Point, Neb., Oct. 24, 1910. Getting Around the Tower of Babel

By Ray G. Hulburt

ACCORDING to Genesis, all men at one time used the same language. Having nothing to quarrel about, they seem to have been able to accomplish whatever they might undertake, and Jehovah came down and confounded their language, in order to keep them in their proper place.

Since that remote time there have been various methods, more or less successful, of getting around this difficulty. Two millenniums ago Greek was the language of culture throughout the world, though it was not the first international language. Later, through the influence of the church, Latin came to be the common tongue of the educated. In more recent times French has been the international language of diplomacy, and, in a restricted field, Pidjin English has served as an international language of trade.

Within the past four centuries many projects have been advanced for a purely artificial international language, but none of them proved practicable. A quarter of a century ago a doctor in Poland published a pamphlet describing his plan for an international language, signing it "Dr. Esperanto." Esperanto, in his new language, signifies "one who hopes," and the word came to be used as the name of the language. In this limited space one can do no better than to quote the late Dr. Lloyd, of the University of Liverpool, who said that "when Esperanto is roughly described as a new and artificial language, there remains a good deal to be said in qualification of both these terms, for there is very little in it which did not exist in some other language before, though often in a less uniform, less exact and less swiftly manageable form. . . . Classified philologically, Esperanto is just simplified Aryan, in its modern European, very slightly inflected, form."

The uses of Esperanto in Europe in business and professional affairs has been told in various magazines. It is known that many firms issue catalogues printed wholly in Esperanto, which are splendid specimens of the printers' art; that well-illustrated guidebooks have been issued, telling all about certain cities, and even whole regions which are of especial interest to tourists; that there are international organizations of teachers, of lawyers, of doctors and so forth, and that in most cases each of such societies has a magazine of its own. Possibly it is not so well known that Brazil, some years ago, issued a very sizeable bulletin in Esperanto; that one of the largest railroads in the United States has published a pamphlet in the same language, for distribution among Europeans; that the United States bureau of standards carries on foreign correspondence by means of the "Language of Hope;" or that a young man is traveling in Europe, having already visited nearly every country on that continent, lecturing wholly in Esperanto about one of our western states and illustrating his lecture with colored stereopticon views.

Another interesting phase of the international language movement is its relation to Christianity. Among the aims of Dr. Samenhof, author of Esperanto, are the abolition of war and the realisation of the Brotherhood of Man. Both of these would be expected to appeal to religious people, and besides, a religion whose field is the world should be attracted by any device which would facilitate intercommunication among its adherents of different races and languages.

There is an extensive organization of Esperantist Catholics, which holds an international congress each year. A very creditable monthly magazine, devoted wholly to the interests of Catholicism, is published in Esperanto, besides one or two printed partly in French.

Dia Regno is a magazine published in Germany and devoted to the interests of Protestant Christianity among Esperantists. At the annual world congress of Esperantists held at Antwerp, Belgium, last year, there was a conference of Protestant Christians from seven different nations, at which a commission of five members was selected to draft plans for a permanent organization. America is represented on this commission by a Baptist, the Rev. L. E. Catlin, of Crozer Theological seminary.

The New Testament in Esperanto is to be issued in 1912. Several years of work have been put into this enterprise, for the translators feel that this will be the most important version made since the Testament was written in Greek, the international language of two thousand years ago. Work is progressing, also, upon a book of Esperanto hymns with music. A number of collections of hymns without notes are already in use.

Leading Christian Endeavorers were among the first in America to take an interest in Esperanto. For years the Christian Endeavor World published a regular Esperanto department. An Esperanto exhibit is a regular feature of the conventions of the United Society of Christian Endeavor, comprising the Endeavorers of the United States and Canada.

An extensive Esperanto exposition was provided for the Nebraska Silver Jubilee convention, held at Lincoln last October. This convention, attended by more than 1,200 delegates, was one of the greatest state conventions held in the history of the Christian Endeavor. There were exhibited here a number of letters from prominent people, one of the most interesting being a statement from Helen Keller, the only deaf-blind person with a college education, saying that she is interested in Esperanto and has some books about it.

Shortly before the convention, two or three periodicals in Europe published an announcement that Esperanto would have a place on the program, and that messages of greeting from foreign Christians or societies would be welcome. In spite of the lateness of the announcement, the response was good.

From Holland came a message in part as follows: "By means of Esperanto I now am able to talk and correspond with Christian brothers and sisters in different lands, although I am only a simple farm laborer." From England, "I am a Wesleyan minister, hedged in by sickness and age, and cannot take much part in any kind of meetings, but watch with great interest all Christian work in the whole world, especially that in my own country and in the sister republic across the sea." From Switzerland, "I desire the greatest success for your Christian Endeavor convention, but I regret that the Christians, here at least, do not accept the help which Esperanto would give to them." From Bohemia, "As a sincere friend of Christian Endeavor, I send the most cordial good wishes, and desire great success for the convention." A Spaniard sent a bit of verse telling how God has given us a language, everywhere comprehensible, by which we may make known the name of Christ to the ends of the earth. A school girl in Hungary sent a picture of an Esperanto group, consisting of fourteen girls and their teacher, with the greetings of all. A Belgian wrote that he was planning to make a lecture trip among the Y. M. C. A.'s of that country during the winter, and would be glad to have an account of what was done at the Nebraska convention, to incorporate in his lecture. There were other messages, from Siberia, Russia, Poland, Norway and Germany.

More epoch-making than any of these, however, was a message of greeting sent by order of the Christian conference already described as meeting at the time of the world congress at Antwerp.

Besides the exhibits there were two conferences, at which Esperanto experts explained the nature and advantages of the language, answered questions and dispensed literature. There was also a complete religious service, with hymns, prayers and a sermon—in fact, everything usually found in a church service except the collection—held in the city auditorium on Sunday, October 29. A full outline of the order of service was printed in the official program of the convention. In addition the order of service, printed in Esperanto, including the text of the hymns, of the creed, of the Lord's Prayer and so forth, was furnished each person who attended the service. The same program was printed entire in the morning edition of both of the city's daily papers.

Since that time a regular Esperanto department has been established by the officers of the Nebraska Christian Endeavor union, on a par with its Junior, missionary, Christian citizenship and other departments. These Endeavorers believe that Dr. Zamenhof is not mistaken in the belief that a common language will beget common aims and common aspiration, thus leading to universal peace and brotherhood; and they believe that such a state of affairs will help to bring on earth the condition which Jesus of Nazareth had in mind when he spoke of the Kingdom of Heaven.

OLD PURITAN JAIL

Church Tower Where Separatists Were Confined.

Brewster and Bradford, Who Formed Resolution of Going to Holland, Were Apprehended and Placed in Boston Edifice.

London.—The tower of Boston church in Lincolnshire stands proud and queenlike, its foot all but lapped by the salt spray of the Wash. Itself is Boston—the Boston which tourists from the greater city of Massachusetts carry home in the mind's vision. Yet from several points of view the grand old church, in spite of its lofty pinnacles and sweet carillon, is less interesting and less an embodiment of the local past than a building a hundred yards away, which is humble by comparison. This is the old Guildhall, long since disused for municipal assemblies, and now to be turned into a town's museum as a memorial to the late King.

It still possesses a grave dignity. You can conjure up the day when it was the house of the Guild of the Blessed Mary—Queen Mary the Tudor—and had a table of alebaster two yards in length, above which were "five candlestyks henging like potts."

The deserted banqueting hall makes it easy to imagine the prodigal way in which toasts were honored here in old world Novembers when the corporation of this ancient borough had a prestige few others could rival. The great west window is still filled with early tracery and some remnants of the ancient stained glass. And the ample hearths are here, and below in the kitchens is the appetizing spit. And there is something less jovial than a spit in the kitchen. It holds a number of prison cells.

The writer fitted himself into the cramped space of one of them, and the gate was clanged to; but he had no such sinking of the heart as some others must have felt 300 years ago. A vague tradition has it that John Cotton, vicar of Boston, and leader of the Puritans in the new world, was imprisoned here. I have it on the authority of a Boston minister, who knows the story of the Guildhall through and through, that the tradition is baseless. Indeed, was John Cotton ever imprisoned anywhere?

Corner of Old Boston Church.

Nevertheless, these cruel stones are sacred to the Pilgrim Fathers. It is part of history that some of the Separatists, including William Brewster and William Bradford, formed the resolution of going from Boston to Holland by a Dutch sloop. They were apprehended at the point of sailing, and lodged, not without contumely, in these very cells. The cells were in the nature of a place of retention while the prisoners were awaiting the magistrates, rather than an actual dungeon in which they served a sentence. But it was a heartbreaking experience for the elders, meaning months of confinement for some of them. Brewster suffered the most.

It is strange by what threads the present is bound to the distant past. A few paces from this very Guildhall there is another illustration of time's whirligigs. At the back of a timber yard is the red-brick Hussey tower, a structure about as old as the ill-fated Tattershall castle, ten miles away. The owner was Sir John Hussey, who was beheaded by Henry VIII. for high treason. At about the same period a sum of money was left by a member of the Hussey family for the education of black slaves, and, strangely enough, the fruits of that legacy have quite recently been applied to the work of Dr. Karl Kumm, in Africa. That old tower, with its broken parapet, and the land about it is, through a mediaeval bequeathment, assisting the Regions Beyond Missionary union. Is it not strange how old things work themselves out?

Knew Nothing of Chimneys

Convenience in Common Use Today Evidently Was Unknown Some Centuries Ago.

In the excavations at Pompeii and Herculaneum no discovery appears to have been made of anything approaching the nature of the modern chimney.

The earliest mention of the chimney seems to be in an ancient Venetian inscription over a doorway, where it is written that in 1347 certain chimneys in that location were demolished by earthquakes. It is by conjecture only that we are able to say that the chimney was known in ancient Italy. Seneca, who lived during the first century of our era, invented a species of tube which he affixed to the length of the wall, and it seems to have run through floors.

Through this the heat passed from subterranean ovens called "hypocausts," of which remains were found in buried cellars of houses built on the Bay of Naples.

But in this there is no evidence of any chimney in the modern sense or even of any kind of stove. Before the invention of the chimney fires were made in excavations or pits opened beneath the floor of habitations in about the center of the room, as the Eskimos do today.

The hearth of the ancient Romans was in the porch, but the fires lighted there were not designed to make houses habitable, seemingly, but were merely an indication of hospitality to friends.

The houses, when occasion called for heat, were furnished with frying pan and bellows carried from room to room by slaves. This was in more or less constant operation day and night in very cold weather. In the early centuries of the Middle Ages there seems to have been an attempt made to perfect the very elementary fashion of house-warming.

Before the seventeenth century there is no direct evidence available that a satisfactory method had been found to evacuate the gases liberated to combustion.—Harper's Weekly.

Old Town Site Excavated.

A remarkably interesting archaeological discovery, believed to be the site of a very ancient [illegible] been made in the course of excavations at Gillingham, Dorset, England. This discovery was made about 10 ft. below the present surface, and consisted of traces of the bed of an ancient lake or river. Several stout pieces of oak had been driven into the bed, and some large bones of a deer, the skull and antlers of a red deer, the jawbone and teeth of a large herbivorous animal, and a large number of worked flints were found. The site, which was discovered during excavations for the grammar school swimming baths, is thought to be of much greater antiquity than the famous Lacustrine village of Glastonbury. It was situated under an alluvium of blue clay.

Parental influence has been the study of scientists for ages, and many wonderful results have been recorded, but the most remarkable case known has come to light in this city. White rats striped with brown have been bred at the penitentiary here by Newton Trusty, a convict, and the association of the rats with convicts wearing striped colors, the body of the clothes being white and the stripes brown, is believed to account for these freak rats.

Trusty was sent to the penitentiary years ago for murder, and was to have served a life sentence. Hope of securing a parole or pardon caused him to study out some method of making money while in the prison, and he decided to breed white rats and sell them. He had been conducting the rat-breeding farm within the prison walls for years before the first white rat striped with brown made its appearance. [illegible] male gave birth to another litter of striped rats, which laid the foundation for the freak rats, which were good enough sellers to earn Trusty a snug sum of money, so that when he was paroled recently he had money enough to go to his native county and buy a farm.—New York Herald.

Long Years of Faithful Work.

Eighty years in a colliery is the record of a Yorkshire (England) miner, John Inman, who is still at work at the low shaft of the Denby Grange collieries. Although 85 years old, he is in charge of an engine, and is able to give the machinery all the attention it requires, working full time each day, and sometimes seven days a week. Inman was only five years old when he began work as a "trapper," opening and closing the underground doors through which the trucks pass on their way from the working face to the shaft. For these duties he received fourpence a day. He has held the position of engineman for many years and although offered an opportunity of retiring on a pension, he prefers remaining with his engine.

Deaf Mutes Fling Epithets in Court

NEW YORK.—There was a silent commotion of an extraordinary character before Magistrate Krotel in Center street court the other day when Henry J. Hecker, a deaf-mute pressman of 754 East One Hundred and Fifty-second street, appeared as complainant against Miss Nora Sullivan, a young woman of twenty, also a deaf-mute, of 330 Water street. Hecker charged that Miss Sullivan grossly insulted him on the street last Saturday afternoon, flinging a broadside of slanderous epithets at him from the tips of her fingers and then banging him on the head with an umbrella.

There was no deaf-mute interpreter in court when the case was called and Magistrate Krotel was at a loss to understand the multitude of high signs that were snapped at him. Hecker vainly talked himself into a state of manual palsy, and court attendants were sent scurrying everywhere for an interpreter. Finally Police Sergeant Quackenbos, who is six feet tall and built like a hack, was reached at police headquarters and came down to court while the quiet excitement was at its height.

Complainant Hecker was pretty weak in the wrists when he took the stand and related how he had been insulted and thwacked with the umbrella.

Then Miss Sullivan took the stand and talked so fast that Quackenbos couldn't get her. He told the magistrate she was having a fit of manual hysterics.

At last Miss Sullivan talked herself into a swoon and was carried to an ante-room. Brought out again, she talked herself into another swoon and came out of No. 2 quite limp. Then it was drawn from her that Hecker had made unpleasant left-handed remarks to her.

"I guess this is all we can stand for one day," adjudged the court.

As the two silent factions filed out of the courtroom there was a wireless riot in the corridors.

Man Dies After Fifty Years' Silence

DIGBY, NOVA SCOTIA.—Within a few hundred yards of a beach where 51 years ago two fishermen found him with his legs amputated, "Gerome," Nova Scotia's man of mystery, died a few days ago, silent to the end about his identity.

Although he undoubtedly possessed the power of speech, "Gerome" had not conversed with anyone in the half century he had been cared for by Didiar Comeau and the latter's sons and daughters.

Away back in the summer of 1861, according to tradition, a ship different from those usually seen here put off a small boat which made for the shore and deposited above the tide line an object that several hours later was discovered to be a man. His legs had been freshly amputated and there was a jug of water and a package of ship's biscuit beside the man, who had suffered greatly from exposure.

Wrapped in blankets and taken to the Comeau house, where, ever since he has been a welcome member of the household, the man was finally revived by a physician. In half a dozen languages the man was asked:

"What is your name?" To this question, in Italian, propounded by the elder Comeau, the man made muttered reply: "Geromo!" Never after that, however, did "Gerome" utter a word except on one occasion when asked where he came from. "Triesta" was the reply made, seemingly in an unguarded moment.

Physicians from all parts of the world, who have visited this Land of Evangeline in the 51 summers that have elapsed since "Gerome" was found on the beach, have studied the man's case. Most of them have agreed that he might have spoken had he decided to do so.

Girls to Enforce Hat Pin Ordinance

AN I'LL SEE TH' CAP'N WHEN I GIT GOOD AN' READY GIT ME
TH' CAPTAIN —W-O-N— WOULD LIKE TO SEE YOU

CHICAGO.—Thieves to catch thieves, and women to catch women. If the first, why not the second?

So reasons John McWeeny, chief of police. And since it sounded good to the head of Chicago's police department thereupon outlined his plans for a regular beauty squad.

Hat pins caused his cogitations and the same pointed reasons, coupled with an old ordinance that never has done duty, will inspire the 20 girls he hopes to enlist in the service.

"You see, my men are bashful," explained the chief. "And men are anyway. Now if you were standing on the corner and a pink cheeked girl strolled by with the points of her hat pins sticking out a foot, would you arrest her?

"No, you'd probably wink your eye at your brother officer and say, 'No, no, my no—she ain't breakin' the law.' So you see, we've just got to have girls to catch girls—a regular beauty squad."

Then when the women with the hat pins strolls by, a fashionably dressed girl, wearing a tiny star where she formerly wore the pin of her sorority, will touch her on the shoulder and suggest that, "The captain wants you."

And herein lies just one fear that may wreck the proposed beauty squad before its organization.

What if the woman shouts: "What for?" and the beauty policeman says: "Your hat pins are too long; they stick out too far; you are under arrest;" will the arrested one cry "Leave me alone or I'll scratch your eyes out?"

Will this be followed by a real hair-pulling contest?

Coed Throws Her Own Effigy on Pyre

I'LL GET EVEN WITH THAT BUNCH OF GOOD-FOR-NOTHIN' SENIORS !!!

ST. LOUIS.—Passengers on a Market street car passing the western end of Forest Park saw a girl trudging along the tracks with what appeared to be the lifeless body of another girl on her shoulder.

The body was clad in a blue suit and a pair of brown-stockinged legs dangled limply. The motorman slowed up the car. One glance at the head of the object and he threw on the power again.

With an indignant look the girl with her burden marched on her way. She was Miss Annie Brown, president of the junior class of Forest Park university, who was carrying her effigy to a grocery store half a mile away to burn it. By burning her own effigy Miss Brown established a precedent.

As the climax in the class fight which had been on between the junior and senior classes for three days, the seniors had abstracted a dress of Miss Brown, stuffed it with paper and [illegible] and hung the effigy on the high oak in the front yard of the university. [illegible] was discovered early in the morning by Miss Gertruda Schneider, vice-president of the juniors. After heroic efforts she managed to cut it down. The question was what to do with it before the entire school saw it.

It was then that Miss Brown decided on the visit to a grocery up the tracks. None of the seniors saw the disposal of the effigy, and all were mystified at seeing the oak tree relieved of its burden.

While the 21 members of the junior class were attending a reception given by Mrs. Anna Sneed Cairns, president of the university, the seniors, 45 strong, stole a march on them by climbing [illegible] poles in the right [illegible] yellow and [illegible]

In the PUBLIC EYE

"ANGEL" OF IMMIGRANT GIRLS

"It's a long time to think back," said Miss Alma Matthews, the "Angel" of Ellis Island, "and one's mind is overflowing with memories and stories. I just don't know where to begin. I began work here for the Woman's Home Missionary Society of the Methodist Episcopal church in 1886, and have been here ever since.

"Just now we deal with girls only, but years ago we often had to care for boys too. When I first began work we used to meet the immigrants at Castle Garden. Those were dreadful times. Runners from all the lodging houses, mostly dives, waited for the gates to open, and when the dazed immigrants were turned loose they pounced on them like wolves, and we had our work cut out for us. But New York soon woke up to the situation and changed all that."

In the bright little parlor of the Home at No. 9 State street, New York, there were young women and girls who had come to the annual reception. Although there was the stamp of the American woman already upon them in the instinct for refinements in taste and dress, yet there still remained some of the accent of the old mother tongue, tempered with the easy and picturesquely slangy idiom of the new mother tongue.

PRESIDENT GOMEZ' BIG JOB

Notwithstanding the statement of President Gomez of Cuba, that he would soon put down the rebellion against his government, there are well-informed Americans who think the Cuban president has a really big job on his hands.

One such man, who recently returned from the island, said that the chief trouble with the Cuban government is that it doesn't understand economics and has no desire to do so. Any person who arises with a suggestion to check the reckless expenditures is quickly squelched. More than anything else Cuba needs some one to curb this throwing away of public money and the United States will have to put some one in Cuba to do that very thing in the near future. The budget must be prepared under some systematic plan of making necessary expenditures for the public good and not under a general plan of distributing money for the benefit of those in office. The Cuban treasury is practically empty now and the country has little to show for it.

A good deal was expected from Gomez. Now fifty-six years old, he is the son of a wealthy cattle raiser. When he was a mere lad he took up arms against Spain and demonstrated his courage and capability. He was inaugurated enthusiastically and it seemed for a time as if he would have the whole people, save a few disgruntled Moderates, at his back. But there were sore spots in the new administration that were not easily cured.

WINSTON CHURCHILL CLIMBING

There is good reason for the keen interest felt in this country in the recent cable dispatches to the effect that Winston Churchill bids fair to be Asquith's successor as premier of Great Britain and leader of the Liberal party.

Half American, as he is through his mother, the present Mrs. George Cornwallis-West, who before she became Lady Randolph Churchill was Miss Jennie Jerome, and who is the daughter of the late Leonard Jerome of New York, his every political act has reflected his friendliness to the United States and his high regard for American political institutions. His induction into the highest political office in Great Britain should mark the beginning of even closer relations between the two countries than now exist. Almost his last political utterance in justification of the Irish home rule bill passed in the House of Commons offered as one of the prime reasons for its adoption his belief that more than anything else it would tend to promote friendship between England and the United States.

YUAN SHI-KAI MAN OF ACTION

The most hopeful sign that the new order of things in China will be better than the old is the rise of leaders. For several decades the Chinese have tried to arouse themselves from their lethargy, so as to become a wide-awake, modern people. In all their struggles upward they have bewailed the lack of leaders. Time and again during the last decades it has been said: "China has no great men, no leaders." The revolution brought the leaders.

Pre-eminent among these stands Yuan Shi-kai, a man who, though trained in the old school, is nevertheless a modern man. He is thoroughly Chinese and understands the capacities as well as the needs of his people. He is eminently a practical man. He is not a theorist, but a man of action.

NATIONAL CAPITAL AFFAIRS

Capitol Trees Planted By Statesmen

HOPE I LIVE AS LONG AS THIS TREE.—

WASHINGTON.—"Give me a real shovel," exclaimed Sunny Jim Sherman, vice-president of the United States, the other day as he stood on the lawn of the capitol and cast a critical and experienced eye at a hole in the ground six feet in diameter and three feet deep. In the hole stood a small tree, destined to be known as the "Sherman tree," and Sunny Jim was there for the purpose of performing the historical business of planting it. An attendant had just handed the vice-president a small spade, child size. Upon his indignant refusal of this implement a man-size shovel with a rounded bit and a long handle was placed in his hands, and if they had not stopped him he would have filled in the hole in a few minutes.

"I supposed I was to plant this tree," said the vice-president as they asked him to desist after he had thrown a few shovelfuls into the aperture. Until this spring only two trees on the grounds of the United States capitol bore the name of any human being. One is known as the Washington elm because when the father of his country used to do some surveying in the vicinity he ate his lunch beneath it. The other was the Cameron tree, so called because Simon Cameron of Pennsylvania paid for having it saved and moved when it was found necesary to use the spot on which it had stood for some other purpose. This spring Elliott Woods, superintendent of the capitol, noting that some of the trees on the grounds were showing age, devised the idea of planting new ones to preserve the appearance of the grounds when the old ones finally gave way.

Nine trees have now been planted and when former Speaker Cannon finishes his, making the count ten, the work for this year will be done. The work for this year will be done.

Lost Hats at the Executive Office

WHERE DID YUH GET TH' HAT ?

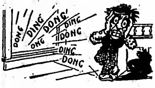
NOW we intend to make it an issue. For some years we have openly lamented that at the executive office of the president of the United States there are no hat racks. The time is at hand when the great issue must be met. Congressman C. B. Slemp of Virginia, who is generally as punctilious as an ordinary mortal can be, finished a rapid-fire conference with the president and came out to find his hat, which he had left upon one of the seats in the outer room. Hastily and then carefuly he looked, but his hat was not there. Someone had changed hats. Now Congressman Slemp's hat was of fairly normal size, and all he could find was a little hat that would cover only the rear end of his head. And that was discovered only after the process of elimination had been applied and the little hat was the only one left.

It is humiliating to think that the statesmen of the country should have to roam about the executive office hunting for stray hats. Of course everybody joked Congressman Slemp, but it was far from a joking matter to walk down Executive and Pennsylvania avenues to a distant hat store. It did not comport with statesmanlike dignity; to say nothing of the embarrassment of meeting on the way his colleagues and other friends who wondered what could be wrong with the intrepid congressman from Virginia.

This may serve as notice to anyone who has by mistake walked away with a size seven and three-quarters "hard-boiled" hat, a derby of late design and good quality, that it should be returned at once to Congressman Slemp. Said hat has associated with it certain memories—besides costing five dollars.

Therefore are we justified in the suggestion that a hat-rack and cloak-room be established at the White House.—Chapple's News-Letter.

Bell "Peeved" Uncle Sam's Young Men



NO longer will the minds of the employes of the patent office be distracted by the jangling of the auctioneer's bell.

For some time past numerous complaints have been made to Clement S. Ucker, chief clerk of the department of the interior, by employes of the patent office, to the effect that their work was interfered with by the incessant ringing of a bell at an auctioneer's establishment, in Seventh street Northwest, between E and F streets, opposite the patent office.

They complained that the bell commenced ringing promptly at 9 o'clock in the morning and that it continued until 4:30 o'clock.

Chief Clerk Ucker finally reported the matter to the police and an attempt was made to arrest the auctioneer on a charge of disorderly conduct. While the warrant was being sworn out in police court, however, Assistant Corporation Counsel Gus A. Schuldt considered the case and rendered a decision to the effect that the auctioneer was not liable to prosecution for the ringing of the bell.

The warrant was not sworn out, but Capt. Michael Byrnes, of the Sixth precinct, visited the auctioneer and explained to him how he was unconsciously interfering with the work of Uncle Sam and slowly demoralizing the patent office. Tears came to the eyes of the auctioneer at the thought of having caused Uncle Sam a moment's trouble, and in broken words notified the captain that it would be unnecessary to arrest him, for he would discontinue the ringing of the obnoxious bell at once.

So the bell will ring no more. That is, during patent office hours. But up to one minute of nine in the morning, and after 4:31 o'clock in the afternoon, the bow-legged wielder of the massive bell will jangle it.

CANNED DAYLIGHT

"CANNED DAYLIGHT" is an illuminating invention of Prof. Walter O. Snelling of Pittsburgh, former expert of the department of agriculture. He is startling Washington scientists and gas manufacturing experts with demonstrations of his new "sunshine" maker, carried in small suitcase.

Liquid gas is Professor Snelling's invention. It is manufactured from waste gases and vapors of oil wells, cheaply produced, easily condensed and transported. That it will revolutionize farm illumination is predicted by its inventor. His suitcase "gas plant" carries enough material to light a room for two weeks, without replenishing, at a cost of about $1.

"Canned" gas, Professor Snelling says, can be supplied farmers at a cost as low per 1,000 feet as city folk now pay. In a single container 2,000 feet, nearly a month's supply, is held in liquid form, to be liberated when burned as needed. The liquid gas [illegible] 1,000 units of ordinary illuminating gas.

THE WORK THAT LASTS.

The work of the quiet, conscientious men does not cease when death stills his heart. He has planned too carefully and wrought too conscientiously for his unselfish labors to pass into oblivion. The world has need of his services and often benefits by them long after his race is run. He may not have made much impression in his lifetime, but for all that he built to the best of his ability and to future generations his work is of enduring value. The quiet worker is never exploited by his fellow-men. Indeed, there are some persons who hold in contempt the man who does not make a stir in the world, says the Charleston News and Courier. It is not always the quality of the work that counts, but rather its spectacular effects. That these effects soon wear away and leave exposed the rough surfaces cannot be questioned, and then it is that men turn with confidence to the results of the unobtrusive, dependable worker, who strives with his heart, as well as with his head. In a recent article on the subject the writer says of the quiet worker that he builds for eternity, and that eternity alone can discover the fine finish of his workmanship. We can take a piece of furniture and paint on it as brilliant a gloss as we wish for, but it will not be long before the cheap brilliancy tarnishes and shows in all its ugliness the painted wood beneath. On the other hand, the fine finish which the master workman gives to the article he is restoring is attained only after the most honest and painstaking efforts, which he directs not to the attainment of immediate final results, but to results which lead gradually to the beautiful finish which crowns his work.

Some Iowa farmers advocate pigs as antidotes for dandelions. Just fence in your lawn and turn a pig inside, they say, and the dandelions will soon be gone. No doubt, but what about the lawn? "Pigs in clover" may do little harm, for mowing machines are heavy enough to traverse hog-wallowed ground, but the ordinary lawn mower would make slow progress over a thoroughly rooted yard. The pigs, we are assured, will go after the dandelions in earnest, because they like them; they will not merely nibble off the tops, but go down into the soil and get the roots. That sounds like a good thing. But after getting all the roots of the dandelions what then? Possibly a well-mannered pig would not molest the grass, but all pigs are not well-mannered. Besides, our city ordinances are so esthetic regarding the matter of pig culture in front lawns that an obstacle seems to arise there, says the Omaha Bee. It may be over-much skepticism, but somehow there is an ill odor of suspicion about this pig scheme making good.

A court of domestic relations in Chicago has decided that a wife is not obliged "to follow her husband and hold out her hand like a monkey for money," but is entitled legally to her share of his means. This will be regarded as an intolerable assault upon sacred and vested rights by the class of husbands who think a wife has no use for money beyond carfare, and that while the wife does her part of the business of the domestic firm, the husband is the only one entitled to handle the cash.

What is a foreigner? It depends on the country. In the United States it is a newcomer who has not yet had time to catch his breath, unpack his kit, and find a job. In India the case is different. An official at Malabar, South India, lately received a letter from a man whose status he was investigating, and who said: "I am a native of India by birth, but I have claim to foreign origin and foreign blood. A colony of Syrians from Edessa settled in Malabar in A. D. 345. I belong to that sect and as such I have reason to claim foreign origin and foreign blood."

A woman in New Jersey testified in a court suit that she disappeared and let her husband believe her dead, to test his affection for her. She fondly expected him to be heart-broken, but found out her mistake when he married again within a month. She ought to have remembered that the first woman's desire to know too much is having serious consequence to this day.

Boston is to have a hospital for the curing of the blues. If the treatment is successful, Boston will be the mecca towards which all who long to add to the gayety of nations will travel. But the hospital itself is likely to be swamped, and between disappointed ambitions, blighted hopes, despairing lovers and human tanks, its process of eliminating the azure tint and making life one long rosy smile, is likely to drive its practitioners themselves to melancholia of the blackest dye.

PRES. TAFT—TWO TICKETS—ROOSEVELT

The Regular Nomination Comes on 1st Ballot.

Convention Hall, Chicago, Illinois.—With nearly 350 of the Roosevelt delegates declining to vote and hastening away at adjournment time to tender to Colonel Theodore Roosevelt the nomination of a new party, the 15th Republican national convention at the end of a long and tumultous session renominated Wm. Howard Taft of Ohio for president, and James Schoolcraft Sherman of New York vice president.

President Taft received 561 of the 1,078 votes in the convention, or 21 more than a majority. Vice President Sherman's vote was 579.

The decision of the Roosevelt people under direction of their leader, to refrain from voting left no other candidate near the president. The announcement of the Taft victory was greeted with cheering from his adherents and groans and hisses from the opposition.

When it became absolutely certain early in the day that Mr. Taft would be nominated without great difficulty, the leaders in control of the convention decided to give him as a running mate his companion on the ticket in 1908.

All others dropped from the race and Mr. Sherman was the only candidate regularly placed before the convention. A motion from New Hampshire to make the nomination by acclamation was declared out of order. There were many scattering votes on the roll call that ensued.

The convention, amid much confusion, adjourned sine die.

At no time was there any indication of a walk-out of Roosevelt delegates. They expressed their revolt by silence. The revolt was open from the moment the 'permanent roll containing the names of contested delegates was approved.

A "valedictory" statement was read in behalf of Colonel Roosevelt, asking that his name be not presented and that his delegates sit in mute protest against all further proceedings.

A great majority of the Roosevelt delegates in the Illinois and all in the Missouri and Idaho delegations declined to follow this advice, but Colonel Roosevelt's sway over the delegation from California, Kansas, Maine, Minnesota, Nebraska, New Jersey, Pennsylvania, South Dakota and West Virginia was all but absolute.

The split in the convention occasioned no surprise. It was but a fulfillment of predictions that had been made during the past several days.

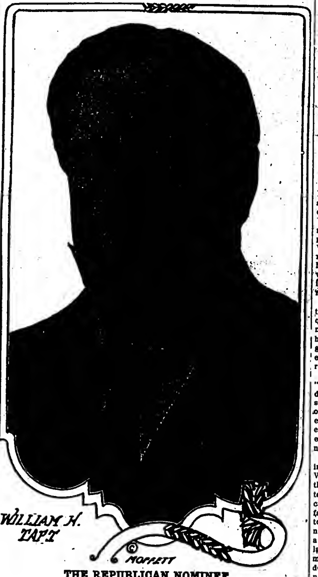
The closing scenes of the convention were marked by counter demonstrations for President Taft and Colonel Roosevelt.

First Test Vote.

The first test vote after the announcement of the Roosevelt valedictory came on the adoption of the party platform. The affirmative vote was 666. Roosevelt delegates present and not voting numbered 343. There were 53 nays, 36 of them from the La Follette states of Wisconsin and North Dakota.

The name of Senator Robert M. La Follette of Wisconsin was placed before the convention, but Colonel Roosevelt's wishes were carried out by his followers and they remained silent during the call of the states for nominations.

Many of the delegates however, carried out their primary instructions and voted for the colonel.



THE REPUBLICAN NOMINEE.

On the voting for president the Roosevelt delegates again as a rule remained silent. The detailed vote was:

Taft, 561; Roosevelt, 107; La Follette, 41; Cummins, 17; Hughes, 2; not voting, 344; absent, 6.

In the confusion just before adjournment a resolution was adopted giving the national committee power to declare vacant the seat of any man on the committee refusing to support the nominees of the regular convention of 1912.

With the adoption in its entirety of the credentials committee's report, following its adoption piecemeal, the permanent organization of the Republican national convention was reached shortly after 3 p. m.—a point in the proceedings, usually one of the phases of the second day, in ordinary conventions.

The committee on permanent organization recommended that the temporary organization be made permanent. Senator Root yielded the gavel to Representative Olmstead of Pennsylvania while the motion was put. It carried. There were cries of "Speech, speech," and Senator Root stepped forward.

It had taken nearly five days for the committee to get to its permanent organisation, an unprecedented state of affairs.

Roosevelt Valedictory.

The demonstration continued several minutes. Then Senator Root spoke. "I thank you, my friends, from the bottom of my heart." he said. "My first act as permanent chairman of this convention is to ask unanimous consent that a delegate from the state of Kansas—our Republican brother, Henry J. Allen—be permitted to make a statement. Is that all right? The chair hears no objections."

James S. Sherman.

Mr. Allen then came forward to read the Roosevelt statement and to pronounce the "Roosevelt valedictory." When he announced he was about to read "a statement just placed in my hands from Colonel Theodore Roosevelt," the Roosevelt adherents broke into a demonstration and cheering and renewed cries of "We want Teddy."

Mr. Allen when he had obtained attention, asked that the delegates keep quiet: that what he had to say was not intended to start demonstrations but to set out the position of Progressive Republicans. He was listened to attentively for a time and first read the Roosevelt statement.

"We have reached a point," he said, "where a majority of the Roosevelt delegates feel that they can not longer share in the response for the acts of this convention. We have contended with you until we have exhausted every parliamentary privilege in the effort to have placed upon the roll the names of men legally elected.

"We will not participate with you in completing the scuttling of the ship. We will not say to the young men of the nation, who, reading political history, with their patriotism, long to catch step with the party of their fathers, that we have nothing better to offer them at this hour than this new declaration of human rights that a discarded political committee as its last act holds greater power than a majority of over 2,000,000 voters. We don't bolt. We merely insist that you, not we, are making the record. And we refuse to be bound by it. We have pleaded with you 10 days. We have fought with you five days for a 'square deal.' We fight no more. We plead no longer. We shall sit in protest and the people who sent us here shall judge us."

Mr. Allen was followed by a storm of cheers as he concluded and left the platform.

Coup by Taft Men.

Then came a distant and surprising coup by the Taft leaders. A big fight had been expected on the report of the rules committee which sought to change the rules in many respects, giving greater power to the national committee and perpetuating in the minds of the Roosevelt followers, the methods of the present convention.

When the committee reported, Watson, the Taft leader, moved to lay it on the table. This was carried with a whoop leaving the convention operating under the rules of the convention of 1908. A resolution to so proceed "until the adoption of new rules," was passed the first day of the convention. A minority report from the committee on rules also laid on the table.

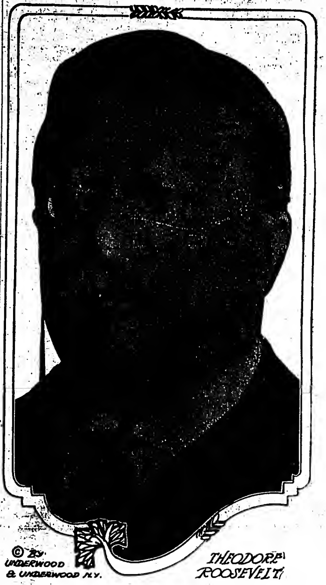
The proceedings were moving along [illegible] now and former Vice President Fairbanks, chairman of the resolutions committee was introduced to read the platform. He was greeted with applause.

The reference to the administration of President Taft was received with cheers, but the demonstration was over in a moment.

As he concluded, Mr. Fairbanks moved the adoption of the platform.

Delegate Walter C. Owens of Wisconsin was recognized to present the La Follette platform offered as a complete substitute. The North Dakota delegates joined with Wisconsin in urging the La Follette ideas.

J. J. Blaine of Wisconsin, closed the debate with a tribute to Senator La Follette. The La Follette platform then was laid upon the table.



THE INDEPENDENT NOMINEE.

On the adoption of the platform, Barnes, the Taft leader from New York, demanded a roll call. It was ordered.

There was great interest in watching the action of the Roosevelt delegates.

ROOSEVELT MEETING

Chicago, June 24.—Former President Theodore Roosevelt was nominated for president on an independent ticket, in the dying hours of the Republican national convention in which he had met defeat.

The followers of Colonel Roosevelt gathered in Orchestra hall, less than a mile from the Coliseum and pledged their support to the former president.

In accepting the nomination Colonel Roosevelt appealed to the people of all sections, regardless of party affiliations, to stand with the founders of the new party, one of whose cardinal principles, he said, was to be "Thou shalt not steal."

The informal nomination of Colonel Roosevelt was said to be chiefly for the purpose of effecting a temporary organization.

Beginning with a call to be issued for a state convention in Illinois, the work of organization will be pushed forward rapidly, state by state. At a later time, probably early in August, it is intended that a national convention shall be held. Colonel Roosevelt, in accepting the nomination, said he did so on the understanding that he would willingly step aside if it should be the desire of the new party, when organized, to select another standard bearer.

Prendergast Makes Speech.

The speech nominating Colonel Roosevelt was made by Comptroller William H. Prendergast of New York, who was to have presented the colonel's name to the convention.

Dean William Draper Lewis of the University of Pennsylvania law school, who was to make one of the seconding speeches, delivered the address which he had prepared for the Republican convention.

Representatives of 23 states composed the notification committee which informed Colonel Roosevelt of his nomination, and in a sense stood as sponsors for the movement.

The committee consists of Comptroller W. A. Prendergast of New York, Meyer Lissner of California, former Congressman Richmond Pearson of North Carolina, Frank Knox of Michigan, Matthew Hale of Massachusetts, A. R. Garford of Ohio, David Browning of Kentucky, Eyard Bierer, Jr., of Utah, Walter Thompson of Vermont, Judge Oscar R. Hundley of Alabama, Judge Ben F. Lindsay of Colorado; Andrew Rahn of Minnesota, Judge Stevens of Iowa, Judge Lowder of North Dakota, William Allen White of Kansas, John C. Greenway of Arizona, ex-Governor John Franklin Fort of New Jersey, Col. E. C. Carrington of Maryland, Pearl Wight of Louisiana, Lorenzo Dow of Washington, Walter Clyde Jones of Illinois, and Frank Frantz of Oklahoma.

Red Badges Worn.

The first persons admitted to the hall were those wearing large red badges with the words "National Republican convention, compliments of Roosevelt national committee." The wearers were the Roosevelt "steam rolled" delegates who were excluded from the Republican national convention.

Delegates Delayed.

Governor Johnson, the most belligerent of all the anti-Taft leaders, who was the first to leave the Republican convention, after the credentials committee report had been adopted, announced that the arrival of the delegates would be delayed.

Among other Roosevelt champions to arrive early was E. C. Carrington of Baltimore, leader in the Maryland Roosevelt campaign.

Among others present were Robert C. Novario of Cleveland, Ohio, who painted the portrait of Roosevelt which was suspended in the rear of the stage; Frank Knox of Michigan, secretary of the state committee; Harry A. March and D. C. Henderson of Ohio; William Flinn of Pittsburg, recently resigned from the Republican national committee; Francis J. Heney of California; Alexander P. Moore, Pennsylvania; James R. Garfield, Ohio; E. R. McCormick and J. Medill McCormick, Chicago, and A. B. Butler of Oklahoma and Washington.

Minnesotans Head Parade.

The delegates from the Coliseum convention arrived in a body and marched into the hall, headed by Senator Clapp of Minnesota and the Minnesota delegation which joined the California delegation on the stage.

NERVOUS HEADACHE

And Numbness in the Hands and Arms.

This Iowa Woman Was in a Serious Condition and Her Cure Will Interest Many.

A cure of unusual interest and importance is related by Mrs. J. H. Morgan, of Correctionville, Iowa. After being a hopeless sufferer from sick headaches, she is now entirely free from attacks. She tells of her cure by Dr. Williams' Pink Pills, as follows:

"Some years ago I was in a terribly nervous and run-down condition and suffered greatly from nervous headaches. I was treated for three months by a specialist in Chicago, who advised me to wear glasses, but he did not help me. My head seemed as though it would burst, and I had frequent dizzy spells. I was in despair of getting well until I read about Dr. Williams' Pink Pills for Pale People and began taking them. A few boxes cured me and since then I have used them as a family medicine.

"Before the birth of my last child I suffered untold agony with pain and numbness in my hands and arms up to the shoulders. My hands were so swollen and the muscles so sore that I could hardly dress myself. For a time I could not close my left hand. During the day if I kept moving the pain did not seem to be so bad, but my hands were always numb. I again used Dr. Williams' Pink Pills for Pale People and found them good for this trouble also, as they entirely relieved me."

Unless properly treated sick headache is a disease of many years duration, as it occurs before the twentieth year in two-thirds of the cases and recurs with more or less regularity until the fiftieth year or later. It is usually hereditary and is probably directly caused by a defect in the process which changes the food we eat into blood. Most sufferers are troubled with obstinate constipation which makes it necessary to use a laxative.

An ideal combination treatment is Dr. Williams' Pink Pills for Pale People and the new laxative pills, Pinklets. This treatment is fully described in a little booklet, "The Treatment of Sick Headache," which is free on request, together with a sample of Pinklets, the little laxative pills.

Dr. Williams' Pink Pills are for sale at all druggists, or will be mailed to any address, postpaid, on receipt of price, 50 cents per box; six boxes for $2.50, by the Dr. Williams Medicine Company, Schenectady, N. Y.

Clothes and the Man.

A colporteur in South Carolina, walking many miles through mud, accosted a passerby and suggested the purchase of the Bible. He was refused. The next day, says the Record of Christian Work, after a night's rest and cleanup, he set up his stand in town and had the pleasure of selling a Bible to the very man who had refused to purchase the day before. "I met a muddy man yesterday with Bibles," said he, "who looked like a Methodist tramp. When I buys a Bible I buys it from a Baptist gentleman."

Had Them.

"Do you keep motoring accessories?" asked the man entering the department store.

"Oh, yes," replied the floorwalker, with a bow, "we keep arnica and witch hazel. Drug department, second aisle to the left, please!"

"Heart Throbs and Things"

By M. J. Phillips

(Copyright, 1912, by Associated Literary Press.)

"What can I do for you, ma'am?"

John Wilkie, editor of the Trenton Twice-a-Week Tidings, left the typewriter where he was hammering out an editorial, and approached the high counter. John was undoubtedly homely, with a knobby, angular frame, and untidy hair. He wore thick glasses and a white shirt that always had a smear of printer's ink somewhere about it.

"You might put me to work," answered the visitor with a smile, as she drew off her gloves. "I am E. L. Kimball."

E. L. Kimball shook her head. "Your ad. did not specify; you simply asked for a typesetting machine operator. But if I'm not satisfactory—"

"Oh, you are," John assured her. "If you can run the thing, that's all I care about." Inwardly, however, he was in a panic.

The prospect of having a pretty young woman around the place was a disquieting one. John, despite his downright manner and his matter-of-fact appearance, was very bashful.

E. L. Kimball — he discovered presently the "E" stood for Edith—fitted in perfectly. She not only turned out an incredible amount of work on the machine, but picked up news, and kept a supervisory eye on the "devil," an ink-spattered youth, whose idea of tidying was very elementary. In three months John was wondering what he ever did without her.

One day he stared out at the street and faced a startling fact: He was in love with Miss Kimball!

It rose like a mountain peak above the level plain of his existence, detached from its drab surroundings. In no sense was it part of them. He could not see how it would ever become a part of them. He was, he candidly admitted, an alarmingly homely man. Binnsley, the bank clerk, and Tom Roper, the grocer, who had already paid Miss Kimball some attention, were away above his class when it came to personal appearance.

John Turned Deathly Pale.

So musing, he attacked his morning mail. The second envelope which he slit open contained an appeal for help from a country youth whose "girl" had discarded him for a better-favored rival. The other young man, said the writer plaintively, had taken her to the last two church "soshuls;" they frequently want "bugy-ridin'" together, and they "giggled" when thay passed him. He signed himself "Hartbroken," and wanted to know what he should do about it.

Smiling grimly, John adjusted a sheet of copy paper in the typewriter, and wrote one of those biting, quizzical paragraphs which was giving the "Tidings" a reputation throughout the state.

He reflected complacently there would be others "giggling" at "Hartbroken" and his plight. Then he sent the letter marked, "Don't change," and his comment, up the copy-chute to Miss Kimball.

When the next proof came down for correction, John blinked behind his glasses. "Hartbroken's" letter had been altered as to language, spelling and punctuation; and the editor's flippant comment had not been set. Instead, there were a few words of kindly, sympathetic advice. Poor "Hartbroken" was transformed from a gawk to be laughed at to a shy youth who suffered.

At the bottom of the proof the operator had added a sentence of her own. "He appealed to you for advice; it won't be right to make him a laughing-stock."

Wilkie rumpled his hair thoughtfully, corrected the proof and wrote "O. K." [illegible] Miss Kimball [illegible] the proof up the chute and slapped himself three times on the red bony wrist.

"Heartbroken" was really responsible for the "Tidings'" most popular column. Miss Kimball evolved it, mothered it, and kept it alive. The country youth's letter had evidently touched a hidden spring in Trenton, for missives from the lovelorn came in a steady trickle after that.

John turned them all over to the operator; he didn't want to continue slapping his own wrist. She gave the perplexed advice.

Conniving with the foreman, she set an attractive box head, "Heart Throbs and Things." She filled a column with the letters and her answers, with paragraphs she clipped and wrote, and with some of John's snappy editorial squibs. Launched in the "Tidings," it made an unmistakable hit. John, who had been waiting the chance, raised her salary.

Winter deepened. So did John's love for Edith Kimball. He longed to take her in his arms and kiss away her capable, self-reliant air, to pet and tease and adore her out of the status of a valued employe into that of wife and comrade. Many times he started upstairs, grimly determined to take her busy, dimpled hand off the keyboard and say masterfully, "Put on your hat; we're going to be married!"

An inspiration came to him one evening as he smoked in his office after hours. He selected a cheap plain envelope from his stock of samples, put on his hat and hurried to the office of Bob Sears, a young lawyer with whom he was friendly. There he cut the business card off one of Bob's letterheads and wrote an appeal to the "Heart-Throbs Editor."

"Dear sir," he wrote, "I am a young man of twenty-one and I am very much in love with a young lady who works in the same place I do. I am not at all good-looking, and there are several paying her attention that are, so I fear she does not regard me favorably. I feel that I would make her a good husband, but am afraid to ask her to marry me, as I do not know that she cares anything for me. What would you advise me to do?" He signed "Nathan" and mailed the missive in the plain, typewritten envelope in a train that passed through Trenton at midnight.

When it came back to him a day later decorated with foreign postmarks and addressed to "Heart-Throbs," he sent it guiltily up the chute without opening. Then he fidgeted like a schoolgirl until the long, slim galley proof brought it back in type with Edith's comment attached:

"A true woman does not care for beauty in a man; don't let lack of it worry you. I infer from your letter you are diffident, and have not shown that you care for her. Until you do, she will not cheapen herself by expressing any preference."

John heaved a long sigh and wiped his moist forehead. When the issue containing his letter had been out two days, long enough to reach the mythical "Nathan," he wrote another letter, the gist of which was: "Would you advise me to put my fate to the test? How shall I ask her?"

They were late that week with the second issue of the "Tidings," and Edith was working evenings to catch up. It was eight o'clock Thursday night when the answer came down along with other "Heart-Throbs" stuff: "The editor of 'Heart-Throbs' refuses to propose for you. If you really care for the young woman, you will muster courage enough to ask her."

John turned deathly pale; his lank jaw dropped. Suddenly the air of the office was stifling. He jerked off his coat and rolled up the sleeves of his shirt.

In two minutes he had rolled down his sleeves and put on his coat. He closed the stove, wiped his wet face with his handkerchief, and then noiselessly he opened the rear door of the office and headed for the stairway.

With his foot on the first step he shivered and returned, panic-stricken, to the office. He corrected the proof and sent that up. He rumpled his hair with both hands, as if trying to force a decision into his brain. That seemed to be effective, for with desperate haste he seized a square of copy paper and a pencil, scrawled a single sentence and sent it flying up the chute.

He heard Edith leave her machine and go to the chute; the tin carrier rustled as she took the single sheet out of it. He wiped his forehead again.

There was silence. Then the machine resumed its song. He slumped into his chair.

Another proof came down. He swept its length at a single glance. At the bottom he found what he sought, in cold, impersonal type, his sentence and her answer:

"I am coming upstairs to ask you to marry me."

"Well, I don't know how I can prevent you."

John hurried to the stairs again, went up four steps at a time, and hurried the length of the room. Edith's fingers were flitting busily over the keyboard. (She still had the line she was setting at that particular moment; it's a curiosity.) Her head was bent to the copy.

He dropped to one knee beside her low chair and smothered her in his arms. He kissed her again and again. "Darling," he cried, [illegible]

SPECIAL SESSION HAS ADJOURNED

CORRUPT PRACTICES ACT NARROWLY MISSES DEFEAT AT CLOSE.

THE NEW PRIMARY LAW.

Has Many New Features.—Second Choice Provision Makes It Possible to Get Majority Nomination.

St. Paul, June 18.—The extraordinary session of the Minnesota Legislature came to an end at nine o'clock this morning, when the journal of Monday's proceedings was read and final adjournment taken. Although in session only two weeks, the legislature wheel turned unusually fast and half a dozen measures of unusual value to the people were passed by practically non-partisan action. Of the three measures asked by the governor, two, a state-wide primary and a corrupt practices act passed and re-apportionment was turned down. The next subject that attracted most attention was a bill prohibiting the Modern Woodmen raising their rates in Minnesota until a referendum vote is taken. This was demanded by a considerable dissenting element in the lodge.

The last bill passed was the corrupt practices act.

Controversy between the two houses over this took an unexpected turn when, after the conference committee had agreed on the features of the bill, it became known that enough senators had been procured to vote against the measure to make its defeat certain.

While the conference committee was drawing up a unanimous report on the measure, and members generally believed that on this report it would pass both houses by a unanimous vote, the opposition had interviewed ten members of the upper house and secured their pledges to vote against the act. Advantage was taken of the fact that only 36 members were present and as it required 32 to pass the measure the opposition of only five would defeat it.

The opponents of the bill were enough in number to defeat the measure, but were hopelessly in the minority when the advocates of the measure threatened to adjourn, and to keep the senate in session all summer if necessary until a full attendance could be forced and the bill passed. One by one the opposing senators changed position. The bill finally passed by a vote of 35 to 0.

Discovery of defects in the primary bill led to the reconsideration of the measure and the passage of amendments. It was discovered that the section governing voting machines was not clear and the right of the city of Minneapolis to use its machines under the law as first enacted was questioned. To make certain that Minneapolis was protected C. R. Fowler secured the adoption of an amendment, providing that voting machines could be used in certain cities and that where it was not practical to use them for all elections, that they be used as far as possible and that the ballot system be reverted to for other officers.

Among the minor acts of the closing day was the appropriation of $14,000 for the usual publication of the new laws as supplements to the legal newspapers throughout the state.

The New Primary Law.

The most important work of the session was the passage of the state-wide primary law, known as the "second choice" law.

The new law simply extends the present primary law to all officers in the state with the exception of officers in towns and villages and cities of the third and fourth class and to members of the school, park, and library boards in cities of population less than 100,000, and provides for a second choice in the nomination of such officers. In addition to this, it places the judges of the supreme, district, probate and municipal courts, municipal officers in Minneapolis and county superintendents of schools on a non-partisan basis.

Legislators were practically unanimous in their support of the general idea of a state-wide primary law. They differed only on the second choice provision. The bill as passed provides for the elimination feature.

The purpose of it is to compel nomination by a majority. Under the present system, if three or four candidates run for a nomination, the man receiving the highest number of votes is nominated. He might have more votes than any one of the other candidates, but still receive less than one-third of the entire vote cast. By this method a minority would nominate.

The second choice is provided to correct this defect. Under the new plan each voter has the privilege of casting a first and second choice vote. His first choice would, of course, go to the man he desired nominated, and his second choice to the man he desired, in case his first choice could not win. At first count of votes for any office, the first choice vote are counted. If one man has the majority of the first-class votes cast for that office, he is declared the nominee. But if not, then the man receiving the lowest number of first-choice votes is eliminated.

Every man who voted for this candidate also has a second choice expression. The first choice votes are abandoned and the second choice votes taken. They are applied to the first choice votes of the other candidates, as they were cast.

Then another count is made of the first choice votes that each surviving candidate received, combined with the second choice votes that he received from the voters who had cast a first choice expression for the man eliminated. Then if none had sufficient votes to make up a majority of the first choice votes originally cast the next lowest man is eliminated and his votes applied. By this method it is held that the man nominated receives either a first or second choice expression from a majority of all the voters who voted for that office. He holds intact the first choice votes he originally received. In addition to these he receives the second choice votes from enough of the voters who voted for the other candidates to give him a majority. A ballot under this rule would look like this:

	First Choice	Second Choice
A. B.	X
C. D.
E. F.		X
G. H.

The voter in this instance cast his first choice vote for A. B. and his second choice for E. F., the theory being that he wanted A. B. nominated in preference to all others, but that if A. B. could not win his second choice was E. F.

Carried out to a final count after all the voters had been counted the tally sheet would look like this:

Candidates	First Choice	Second Choice AB	CD	EF	GH
A. B.	50		30	15	5
C. D.	40	25		10	5
E. F.	25	15			3
G. H.	5	3	1	1

This total would show that A. B. received 50 first choice votes, more than any other single candidate. But the total number of first choice votes cast numbered 120, so he would not receive a majority.

Sixty-one votes would give a majority. As no candidate received a majority of votes, G. H., who received the least number, would be eliminated. He received but five first choice votes. Each of these, however, would express a second choice vote. The table shows that three expressed a second choice for A. B., one for C. D., and one for E. F.

Then, under the rule, the first choice vote of A. B., C. D. and E. F. would be combined with the second choice votes each received from those voters who originally voted for G. H., A. B., having received three votes, this total would be increased from the original 50 first votes to 53. This would not be a majority so the next lowest man, E. F., would be eliminated, and his second choice votes applied. Of these, A. B. received 15 and C. D. none. A. B. at this point has increased his original first choice vote of 50 to 68 by the three second choice votes he received from the voters who had voted for G. H., first choice and 15 from those voted for E. F., first choice. On the other hand, C. D., who stood next highest in the race, received but one second choice vote, from G. H. and none from E. F. Then his original 40 first choice votes would be increased by but one. A. B., in other words, has a total of 68 votes or more than a majority of the total of the original first choice votes cast and he would be declared the nominee.

The theory carried further is this, that A. B. received either a first or second choice vote from the majority of all the voters voting at the election. He received 50 first votes at the outset. To this was added the second choice votes of 15 who voted for E. F. and three from those who voted for G. H. His nomination would be by majority.

As applied to the three largest cities the law means that as far as the nominations for state legislative, congressional, United States senators, and county officers are concerned the second choice rule would apply. The nominations of all judges, municipal officers in Minneapolis and the county superintendents of school are placed on a non-partisan basis.

Here the second choice provision does not apply. But the two men receiving the highest number of votes for each office at the primary election are declared the nominees. They will oppose each other for the office at the general election.

Gen. F. D. Grant, when discussing military neatness, used often to tell a story about his father.

"My father was talking to General Sherman in his tent one day," he would begin, "when a third general entered, a brigadier notorious for his slovenliness. Senator Duncan U. Fletcher was condemning at a dinner in Jacksonville an orange grower who had failed.

THE SUNBEAM.

BY W. G. HUNT.

Entered as Second-class matter August 30 [illegible]05, at the post office at Sunbeam Minn. under the Act of Congress of March 3.1879.

We note that a large number of our exchanges do not express any editorial opinion whatever on the issues of the day, and a number of them only have five or six locals scattered here and there, although they are located in a thriving village, but in numerous places we see subscribe for The ——— and we often wonder what for!

E.T. Young former attorney general has declared himself a candidate for the republican nomination for governor. Mr. Young is a man who stands very high in the estimation of the common people of Minnesota, and the man that gets more votes than he does at the Primary election will know that he has been in a race. But Eberhart is the man that had ought to be the nominee of the Republicans this year, as he is just the boy to be the running mate for Taft.

John T. Gullingsrud of Thief River River Falls has filed for the Republican nomination for County Treasurer, on the Republican ticket. The present incumbent Andrew Trovotan has not announced whether he will be a candidate or not. Some of the present county officers may bind when the Decide to become candidate for re-election that their supporters have promised the other fellow, not knowing they intended to run for reelection.

With Gordon and Lee, as his opponents at the Primary Election and P.M.Ringdahl as the Democrat Nominee, the gods of war would be good to Eberhart. But it does not seem possible that the Democrats were foolish enough to place a man in nomination and expect him to be elected for governors of this state, who made a motion in the State Senate to have the election of a champlin indefinitly postponed. We do not attact a mans religion, on the quality or name of it, but we never had much time for the Bob Ingersoll Doctoring as we were not brought up that way.

Taft was nominated for president at the Chicago Republican Convention Monday. This is clearly a case of the party ignoring the will of the people, and trying to force a president onto the people that they have repudiated. All honor to our Republican Delegates from Minnesota who refused to join the mob that nominated Taft, but said "We shall sit in silent protest, and the people who sent us here shall judge us." Good boys you did right. As for ourselves and the interests of the people up this way we shall wait for the further movements of the true republican leaders before offering any further advice or opinion, but we will again repeat what we have said before and that is, that Taft will step out of that office the 4th of next March even if Major Shunk of the Enginiers and W.G.Hunt both vote for him.

Now would be a mighty good time for all the country editors to make up their minds to refuse acceptance of any campaign plate matter furnished free by the plate houses at the expense of the [illegible] national committees. The very recent we might say present, unpleasantness in the ranks of the republican party has demonstrated that millions are available for the prosecution of a national campaign. If the national committee wants to reach the people through the local newspaper; let them pay the publisher of those papers, instead of the giant plate octopus. Under present conditions the average country editor gets not a cent for the space used in this manner, but it's the biggest kind of a graft for the plate houses."—Northern Light.

Now let us see how many editors will stand by this. There will be no free plate shoved into THE SUNBEAM by plate houses in this campaign. Don't be made tools and fools of by the plate houses and city dude editors, you country brethren.

The new primary law passed by the special session of the legislature gives the voter a chance to express his first and second choice for the party nominee and provides for non-partisan judicial elections. There was considerable opposition to the second choice feature, but when came to a "show down" the bill passed by a practically unanimous vote.

Not in Silence.

"You're forever trying to give the impression that you're a martyr," snapped Mrs. Henpeck. "I suppose you want everybody to think that you suffer in silence."

"No," replied Mr. Henpeck; "I suffer in the perpetual absence of silence. A little silence would be a positive pleasure to me."

TO LIVE IN FACT.

Life is what we are alive to. It is not a length, but breadth. To be alive only to appetite, pleasure, pride, money making, and not to goodness and kindness, purity and love, history, poetry and music, flowers, God and eternal hopes, is to be all but dead.—Babcock.

Ends Hunt For Rich Girl.

Often the hunt for a rich wife ends when the man meets a woman that uses Electric Bitters. Her strong nerves tell in a bright brain and even temper. Her peach bloom complexion and ruby lips result from her pure blood; her bright eyes from restfull sleep; her elastic step from firm, free muscles, all telling of the health and strength Electric Bitters give a woman, and the freedom from indigestion, backache, headache, fainting and dizzy spells they promote. Everywhere they are woman's favorite remedy. If weak or ailing try them. 50c at all Druggists.

Didn't Have to Obey.

On one occasion Senator Root, accompanied by two friends, a banker and a literary man, were at a theater in Boston. Directly in front of the banker was a man who was asleep and snoring vociferously, much to the annoyance of the trio. Without seeking the assistance of an usher the banker shook the sleeper by the shoulder and awakened him, only to be told to "Go to ——."

"Now sit down," said the senator. "You know you don't have to go there [illegible]"

A young fawn came out on our field on last Sunday, and did not seem to be very wild but had no difficulty in bounding over the fence as soon as he heard the dog bark.

The river has been jammed so full of logs the past week that it is almost impossible to get across it It was unfair for the department of the Interior to sell those lands to the settlers without informing them that the Red Lake River was under the control of the lumber companys.

There has been a few log drivers along the river this week, but not half enough to keep it clear of log jams, which have been jammed into the river for 10 miles at a stretch.

Mr. James O'Brien made us a pleasant call Sunday afternoon.

If the denial of the lumber companys is true about not having Red Lake River jammed, we all wonder where they kept their logs last winter?

Paul King and John W. Libnitz two of our old Polk County friends made this office a pleasant call yesterday. They are pleased with the appearance of the country and may decide to buy land here.

NOTICE: A meeting of the share holders and Board of Directors of the Red Lake River Transformation Co. will be held at the Highlanding school house on Saturday July 6th, at 1 o'clock p.m. There is now plenty of water in the Red Lake River for navigation, and let us get our boat to running. All turn out.

A. D. Brown, President.

The Red Lake River is now at a flood stage although there has been no rain. People living below will be surprised to see a flood during a drouth, yet the lumber companys, backed up by that Engineers outfit at St. Paul can do wonders. Then to vote to keep a "fat gang" like that in power. A man that comes up this direction asking for votes for Taft, had better provide himself with a bumb proof wagon and ask old Tafts friend Eberhart to furnish him a military escort.

The weather continues to be very dry and crops are needing rain badly, and if it don't come soon crops will be very light in this locality. Late sown flax is suffering the most from drouth.

He Had Told It.

Next to Joseph Chamberlain, Birmingham honors no citizen more than Jesse Collings. In politics and friendship Mr. Chamberlain and Mr. Collings have been inseparable for many years. They even shared their platform anecdotes, and in regard to one story they arranged that when both were taking part in a meeting the first speaker was entitled to its use.

It so happened that Mr. Collings arrived late at a meeting one night but was due to speak before Mr. Chamberlain. As he was launching out into the story he felt his coattail pulled, and a voice behind him whispered, "I've told it." So Mr. Collings desisted, but what was his surprise to hear Mr. Chamberlain tell the story as soon as he got on his legs. "I thought you said you told it?" he asked afterward. "So I had," replied the imperturbable Joe, "but not tonight."—Pall Mall Gazette.

PIRATES OF HONGKONG.

They Are the Real, Old Fashioned Bloodthirsty Kind.

There are pirates in Hongkong—not the usual kind that greet the gentle stranger with an expansive smile and take what he has for worthless rubbish, nor yet the petty thieves that go by that name on our own water fronts, but the real old fashioned, murderous kind, who count not the victims as they reckon the spoils.

Of course they do not swagger in costume, as all real pirates should, or ply their trade in Hongkong's immediate waters, but among the thousands of fishermen, stevedores and coal handlers that crowd the harbor's edge they mingle and gossip water front news, knowing well when a particularly rich cargo is due from the interior.

And in the purple twilight a junk darts out of one of the many estuaries far up the West or Pearl river and swoops with the suddenness of a hawk on the heavily laden prize. The struggle is short. Over the hills on the naked backs of a swarming crew the loot disappears forever from a smoking hulk in the rice swamps, or, as happened in the case of the Saiham, half a hundred take passage in the crowded hold of a river steamer, and when the handful of unsuspecting whites gather at dinner raise a heathenish yell on the startled air, and the ship is taken. WHEN SPRING CAME

By JEANNE O. LOIZEAUX

It came tardily, with a sudden burst, after long rigid cold, a winter of discontent, the dreariest in William Failing's young life. From the past October when he had ceased to be, so far as Betty was concerned, he had simply set his teeth and endured things, grinding out routine work in the office as though fiends pursued. For the rest, he ate and slept—when he could. He knew work was his only salvation, though he had now nothing to make money for. Betty was not going to marry him. Washburn had won out with her.

Not that she had ever promised to marry Failing. In fact he had not asked her. The word love had not been spoken between them. But he had been so happily confident the whole beautiful summer and autumn that she cared just as he did. They had been inseparable to such an extent that Jerry Washburn had apparently given up his long pursuit of the girl and had gone "back east." Washburn had money, and ability, too.

Now Failing cursed himself for not having made sure of the girl in words. He had not spoken because he was working so desperately to be made junior partner in his business, so that he might have something definite to offer her.

The shock had come in October. One evening he had taken Betty out on the lake, and they had spent hours of delight in the flooding moonlight. The next morning the senior partner had called him into the "Throne Room," and after much pompous prelude made him junior partner with a fourth interest in the business, and an increase of salary that made his heart leap Betty-wards. Excited, exultant, he had tried to thank the senior partner, but the wise old chap had waved him away.

"You'll be no good for some time—get out of here and take a vacation! Off with you!" Failing had snatched his hat. Then he ran out to the street and walked towards Betty's home. He had to feel the ground under his feet—he could not have endured a street car!

When he reached the big old place and had rung the bell, the little maid admitted him. Miss Betty was out for a walk. Would he see anyone else? She would be back in an hour or so. William Failing could bear the sight of no one else just then, and he couldn't wait decorously, so he went out again. He would walk about; perhaps he would meet her. His head and his heart were high.

And never through a long life would he forget the heart-sickness of the rest. Down the street he had swung all radiant with joy, and turning a corner had almost run over little Evie Cross, Betty's house guest, for whom he had never cared much. Her big eyes were almost feverishly bright, but her cheeks were pale and she was manifestly excited. To pass time he turned and walked with her a little.

"You're a laggard in love!" she flung at him. "Lochinvar has come out of the east and captured your fair lady. He came last night, and invited himself to breakfast this morning. He dragged her off before he really decently could. I went off by myself, but I saw them coming in the woods just now." Then she chattered on about anything, everything. Failing left her as soon as he could.

So Washburn was back! Well, he was sorry for the fellow! Failing gave Evie's chaff no credence. Almost unconsciously he made his way through the wood to the crooked path she loved so well.

Then, quite suddenly, he had seen what made his heart stand still. He turned away after a heart-sick instant. Washburn, browned and big, was leaning over Betty, his Betty, kissing both her small hands. Failing had never dared as much. Evie's words came to him, and he strode away, blinded by hurt and anger.

William Failing had gone straight home and packed his things. Then he made a call at the office and bank, bought a ticket, and by night was on his way to Colorado for a month's vacation in the wilds, taking his misery with him.

Finally, he had come grimly back to work as though fiend-pursued. He heard no word of her, and could not to save her life have asked a question about her.

The long winter had dragged along. He had the winter through accepted no invitations, kept out of everything where he might meet her, pleading business until his friends began to let him alone with a vengeance. Finally overwork, no recreation, and trouble made him afraid that he was going to be ill, that he would have to give up and go away from it all.

It was a day in February that he had again seen Betty. This time it was in a book shop. Her eyes were bent over an open volume, and before she saw him he had time to notice deep shadows beneath them, and that her small ungloved hands had grown transparently fragile. There was no look of bridal happiness about her. Then spring came, at a leap, a sudden warmth, a melting, an unseasonable time, when old men croaked of [illegible] fruit trees, and [illegible] interviewed doctors as to the [illegible] warm spells [illegible] William Failing began to [illegible] winter [illegible] himself that he needed aid and exercise, that he had been a fool to let a girl spoil everything for him.

One morning he deliberately left the office and set off for a walk. He walked miles. First he avoided Betty's house, and then came back and made himself pass it. The sun was hot, and little leaves, like a green mist, were beginning to wreathe the trees.

So it was that he came upon her, as once before. But this time she was alone, her arm up against a great tree trunk, her face hidden in the arm. He came a little nearer. She was manifestly crying. Betty crying! He could not help letting everything but his old love for her melt away like the winter's snow.

He was behind her in an instant, taking her by the shoulders, turning her around to face him. She resisted at first, but did not try to conceal the tears in her eyes.

"If—he makes you unhappy I'll—shake the life out of him!" he said. "At best Washburn could never—love you as I always have—"

"What do you mean, William Failing!" Her eyes were wide with utter astonishment.

"Aren't you—engaged to him? I saw him—kissing your hands—you don't allow things of that sort for nothing—" Her look stopped him. Light had come to her. And the man saw her love for him. She had to push him away with both hands.

"You—saw that? I—he made me refuse him again. I had just told him there was somebody else. I didn't let him take my hands—he just did it. That was the instant you chose to see! If you had waited! And then—never to come near me again, or send me a word!" She put her arm up over her face with the gesture of a child.

"Oh," he said, sheltering her in his arms. "If you knew what I have been through!"

She gave a queer little laugh.

"As if I didn't know," she answered happily. Anything in words, however crude and commonplace, after the winter's icy silence was a joy to them. It was probably silly, but the whole world about them had gone silly—if it is silly to be utterly happy for no particular reason save that spring had come.

NO PLACE FOR IDLE WOMAN

Every one nowadays recognizes the absurdity of idleness. For what could be more ridiculous than the idle woman who can find no one to idle with her? So strenuous has modern life become that idleness is completely shorn of its charm, and the girl who either by nature or cultivation possesses an idle temperament is apt to find herself an outsider.

She must do something and do it well if she does not wish to wither of loneliness. There is no place nowadays for the idle woman. Even in the supposedly idle class of the very rich she scarcely has a foothold.

Turn where she will, she will find the woman of her set doing things. The modern woman is steeped to the eyes in work; charities claim her time, new and philanthropic movements hold her attention and humanity knocks insistently at her door. She could not idle if she would and keep her place in the rush of modern progress.

The fact that idleness has fallen into disrepute and is disdained even by fashionable women is a blessing to the girl who must work from necessity. She has no longer to explain and defend her own strenuous attitude. Her friends are too busy themselves, whether from mere inclination or positive necessity, to enter into arguments on the impropriety of man's-work for women.

So it behooves every girl to choose some congenial work and thoroughly prepare herself for it, so if the day of necessity comes she may turn to the thing for which she is fitted and to work which is congenial in order to earn a livelihood.

The young girl of today has everything on her side. She is infinitely better off than the young girl of ten years ago, and if she's wise she will avail herself of her opportunities.—Exchange.

Chickens in Luxury.

Reginald Vanderbilt's Newport farm is one of the best-appointed in the world. Vanderbilt was showing a young Englishman over his farm recently, and especial attention was given to the chicken runs. The hardwood, brass-mounted roosts, the marble drinking fountains, the healthy, airy, inclosed runs for wet and open runs for fine weather, the spotless cleanliness of the translucent white tiling of floors and walls, the sanitary nests—all this impressed the Englishman profoundly.

Vanderbilt at the end of the inspection said: "Well, can you suggest any improvements for my runs?"

"No," said the Englishman, "no, I can think of nothing—unless," he added, "you build them a smoking room and cafe."

SYNOPSIS.

Lieut. Harry Mallory is ordered to the Philippines. He and Marjorie Newton decide to elope, but wreck of taxicab prevents their seeing minister on the way to the train. Transcontinental train is taking on passengers. Porter has a lively time with an Englishman and Ira Lathrop, a Yankee business man.

He resigned himself to the despot, and began to transfer his burdens to the seat. But he did nothing to the satisfaction of the Englishman. Everything must be placed otherwise; the catch-all here, the portmanteau there, the Gladstone there, the golfsticks there, the greatcoat there, the raincoat there. The porter was puffing like a dookey-engine, and mutiny was growing in his heart. His last commission was the hanging up of the bowler hat.

He stood on the arm of the seat to reach the high hook. From here he paused to glare down with an attempt at irony.

"Is they anything else?"

"No. You may get down."

The magnificent patronage of this wilted the porter completely. He returned to the lower level, and shuffled along the aisle in a trance. He was quickly recalled by a sharp:

"Pawtah!"

"Yassah!"

"What time does this bally train start?"

"Tan-thuty, sah."

"But it's only ten now."

"Yassah. It'll be tan-thutty a little later."

"Do you mean to tell me that I've got to sit hyah for half an hour—just waitin'?"

The porter essayed another bit of irony:

"Well," he drawled, "I might tell the conducta you're ready. And mebbe he'd start the train. But the timetable says tan-thotty."

He watched the effect of his satire, but it fell back unheeded from the granite dome of the Englishman, whose only comment was:

"Oh, never mind. I'll wait."

The porter cast his eyes up in despair, and turned away, once more to be recalled.

"Oh, pawtah!"

"Yassah!"

"I think we'll put on my slippahs."

"Will we?"

"You might hand me that large bag. No, stupid, the othah one. You might open it. No, it's in the othah one. Ah, that's it. You may set it down."

Mr. Wedgewood brought forth a soft cap and a pair of red slippers. The porter made another effort to escape, his thoughts as black as his face. Again the relentless recall:

"Oh, pawtah, I think we'll unbutton my boots."

He was too weak to murmur "Yassah." He simply fell on one knee and got to work.

There was a witness to his helpless rage—a newcomer, the American counterpart of the Englishman in all that makes travel difficult for the fellow travelers. Ira Lathrop was zealous to resent anything short of perfection, quick and loud of complaint, apparently impossible to please.

In everything else he was the opposite of the Englishman. He was burly, middle-aged, rough, careless in attire, careless of speech—as uncouth and savage as one can well be who is plainly a man of means.

It was not enough that a freeborn Afro-American should be caught kneeling to an Englishman. But when he had escaped this penance, and advanced hospitably to the newcomer, he must be greeted with a snarl.

"Say, are you the porter of this car, or that man's nurse?"

"I can't tell yet. What's yo' numba, please?"

The answer was the ticket.

"Numba se'm. Heah she is, boss."

"Right next to a lot of women, I'll bet. Couldn't you put me in the men's end of the car?"

"Not ve'y well, suh. I reckon the cah is done sold out."

With a growl of rage, Ira Lathrop slammed into the seat his entire hand baggage, one ancient and rusty valise.

The porter gazed upon him with increased depression. The passenger list had opened inauspiciously with two of the worst types of travelers the Anglo-Saxon race has developed.

But their anger was not their worst trait in the porter's eyes. He was, in a limited way, an expert in human character.

When you meet a stranger you reveal your own character in what you ask about his. With some, the first question is, "Who are his people?" With others, "What has he achieved?" With others, "How much is he worth?" Each gauges his cordiality according to his [illegible]. The [illegible] most curious of any of these points. [illegible] He showed a [illegible] cratic indifference to them. His one vital inquiry was:

"How much will he tip?"

His inspection of his first two charges promised small returns. He buttoned up his cordiality and determined to waste upon them the irreducible minimum of attention.

It would take at least a bridal couple to restore the balance. But bridal couples in their first bloom rarely fell to the lot of that porter, for what bridal couple wants to lock itself in with a crowd of passengers for the first seventy-two hours of wedded bliss?

The porter banished the hope as a vanity. Little he knew how eagerly the young castaways from that wrecked taxicab desired to be a bridal couple, and to catch this train.

But the Englishman was restive again:

"Pawtah! I say, pawtah!"

"Yassah!"

"What time are we due in San Francisco?"

"San Francisco? San Francisco? We are doo thah the evenin' of the fo'th day. This bein' Monday, that ought to bring us in abote Thursday evenin'."

The Yankee felt called upon to check the foreign usurper.

"Porrterr!"

"Yassah!"

"Don't let that fellow monopolize you. He probably won't tip you at all."

The porter grew confidential:

"Oh, I know his kind, sah. They don't tip you for what you do do, but they're ready letter writers to the Sooperintendent for what you don't do."

"Pawtah! I say, pawtah!"

"Here, porrterr."

The porter tried to imitate the Irish bird, and be in two places at once. The American had a coin in his hand. The porter caught the gleam of it, and flitted thither. The Yankee growled:

"Don't forget that I'm on the train, and when we get to 'Frisco there may be something more."

The porter had the coin in his hand. Its heft was light. He sighed: "I hope so."

The Englishman was craning his head around owlishly to ask:

"I say, pawtah, does this train ever get wrecked?"

"Well, it hasn't yet," and he murmured to the Yankee, "but I has hopes."

The Englishman's voice was querulous again.

"I say, pawtah, open a window, will you? The air is ghastly, absoripping-ly ghastly."

The Yankee growled:

"No wonder we had the Revolutionary war!"

Then he took from his pocket an envelope addressed to Ira Lathrop & Co., and from the envelope he took a contract, and studied it grimly. The envelope bore a Chinese stamp.

The porter, as he struggled with an obstinate window, wondered what sort of passenger fate would send him next.

CHAPTER III.

In Darkest Chicago.

The castaways from the wrecked taxicab hurried along the doleful street. Both of them knew their Chicago, but this part of it was not their Chicago.

They hailed a pedestrian, to ask where the nearest street car line might be, and whither it might run. He answered indistinctly from a discreet distance, as he hastened away. Perhaps he thought their question merely a footpad's introduction to a sandbagging episode. In Chicago at night one never knows.

"As near as I can make out what he said, Marjorie," the lieutenant pondered aloud, "we walk straight ahead till we come to Umptyump street, and there we find a Rarara car that will take us to Bloptyblop avenue. I never heard of any such streets, did you?"

"Never," she panted, as she jog-trotted alongside his military pace. "Let's take the first car we meet, and perhaps the conductor can put us off at the street where the minister lives."

"Perhaps." There was not much confidence in that "perhaps."

When they reached the street-carred street, they found two tracks, but nothing occupying them, as far as they could peer either way. A small shopkeeper in a tiny shop proved to be a delicatessen merchant so busily selling foreign horrors to aliens, that they learned nothing from him.

At length, in the far-away, they made out a headlight, and heard the grind and squeal of a car. Lieutenant Mallory waited for it, watch in hand. He boosted Marjorie's elbow aboard and bombarded the conductor with questions. But the conductor had no more heard of their street than they had of his. Their agitation did not disturb his stoic calm, but he invited them to come along to the next crossing, where they could find another car and more learned conductors; or, what promised better, perhaps a cab.

He threw Marjorie into a panic by ordering her to jettison Snoozleums, but the lieutenant bought his soul for a small price, and overlooked the fact that he did not ring up their fares.

The young couple squeezed into a seat and talked anxiously in sharp whispers.

"Wouldn't it be terrible, Harry, if, just as we got to the minister's, we should find papa there ahead of us, waiting to forbid the banns, or whatever it is? Wouldn't it be just terrible?"

"Yes, it would. [illegible] doesn't seem probable [illegible] thousands of [illegible] [illegible] soldier."

"What do you [illegible] Harry?"

"Well, in the first place, honey, look what time it is. Hardly more than time to get the train, to say nothing of hunting for that preacher and standing up through a long rigmarole."

"Why, Harry Mallory, are you getting ready to [illegible] me?"

"Indeed I'm not—not [illegible] honey, but I've got to get that train, haven't I?"

"My own, own honey, love, [illegible] know it's impossible! You [illegible] member that I've already waited over three trains while you tried to make up your mind."

"And you must remember, darling, that it's no easy matter for a girl to decide to sneak away from home and be married secretly, and go all the way out to that hideous Manila with no trousseau and no wedding presents and no anything."

"I know it isn't, and I waited patiently while you got up the courage. But now there are no more trains. I shudder to think of this train being late. We're not due in San Francisco till Thursday evening, and my transport sails at sunrise Friday morning. Oh, Lord, what if I should miss that transport! What if I should!"

"What if we should miss the minister?"

"It begins to look a great deal like it."

"But, Harry, you wouldn't desert me now—abandon me to my fate?"

"Well, it isn't exactly like abandonment, seeing that you could go home to your father and mother in a taxicab."

She stared at him in horror.

"So you don't want me for your wife! You've changed your mind! You're tired of me already! Only an hour together, and you're sick of your bargain! You're anxious to get rid of me! You—"

"Oh, honey, I want you more than anything else on earth, but I'm a soldier, dearie, a mere lieutenant in the regular army, and I'm the slave of the government. I've gone through West Point, and they won't let me resign respectably and if I did, we'd starve. They wouldn't accept my resignation, but they'd be willing to courtmartial me and dismiss me from the service in disgrace. Then you wouldn't want to marry me—and I shouldn't have any way of supporting you if you did. I only know one trade, and that's soldiering."

"Don't call it a trade, beloved, it's the noblest profession in all the world, and you're the noblest soldier that ever was, and in a year or two you'll be the biggest general in the army."

He could not afford to shatter such a devout illusion or quench the light of faith in those beloved and loving eyes. He tacitly admitted his ability to be promoted commander-in-chief in a year or two. He allowed that glittering possibility to remain, used it as a basis for argument.

The Porter.

"Then, dearest, you must help me to do my duty."

She clasped his upper arm as if it were an altar and she an Iphigenia about to be sacrificed to save the army. And she murmured with utter heroism:

"I will! Do what you like with me!"

He squeezed her hand between his biceps and his ribs and accepted the offering in a look drenched with gratitude. Then he said, matter-of-factly:

"We'll see how much time we have when we get to—whatever the name of that street is."

The car jolted and wailed on its way like an old drifting rocking chair. The motorman was in no hurry. The passengers seemed to have no occasion for haste. Somebody got on or got off at almost every corner, and paused for conversation while the car waited patiently.

Mallory looked at his watch, and Marjorie's hopes dropped like a wrecked aeroplane, as he grimly asked how long it would take them to reach the railroad station.

"I'll go to the train with you, Harry, and then you [illegible] in a taxicab. [illegible]"

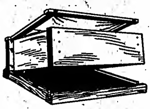
BUTTERMILK CHEESE IS NEW

Great Amount of Waste at Creameries Would Furnish Large Supply of Palatable Food.

(By J. L. SAMMIS.)

Buttermilk cheese is a new product obtained by curdling buttermilk with heat, draining the curd and adding salt. Large amounts of buttermilk are wasted every year at creameries. If this were made into buttermilk cheese it would furnish a large supply of palatable food, equal in food value, pound for pound, to lean beefsteak. It can be sold profitably at half the price of meat.



Easily Made Drain Rack.

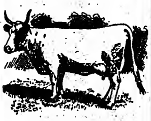
To make buttermilk cheese, the buttermilk is curdled by heating to 80 degrees, and left undisturbed for an hour. It is then heated to 130 degrees and, after standing quiet for about an hour, the clear whey is drawn off the curd, and the latter is placed on a draining rack, which is covered with cheesecloth. Here it remains half a day or over night, until as dry as desired, when it is salted with one and one-half pounds of salt per hundred pounds of curd, and is ready for use. Buttermilk cheese can be made from buttermilk, from cream which was pasteurized before ripening, or the buttermilk may be pasteurized during the process of cheesemaking, in either case insuring the absence of disease germs.

Where only a few pounds of buttermilk cheese are made at a time, as on a farm or for home use, the buttermilk can be heated in a pail or in a clean new wash boiler on the stove. After the second heating, i. e., to 130 degrees, if the curd has settled, the whey can be mostly poured off by tipping the pail, and the curd poured into a small cheesecloth bag to drain. If the curd is floating, it can be dipped off the surface of the whey with a dipper or large spoon and put in the bag to drain. A small wooden draining rack a foot square and five or six inches deep, with the bottom made of one-fourth of an inch mesh galvanized or tinned iron wire netting and covered with cheesecloth, is useful for draining small amounts of buttermilk cheese.

WHERE AYRSHIRE DOES WELL

Scottish Breed Thrives Exceptionally Well on Rough Pastures of Inferior Character.

Under conditions where the land is rough and stony and pasture rather poor, no breed will give as good returns as the Ayrshire. In her native home, Scotland, she inherited a sturdy constitution and an independence which enables her to hunt for a living, but she likewise responds well to good treatment.



Ayrshire Cow With Big Record.

The Ayrshire gives a medium flow of milk of average richness, especially adapted for cheese-making on account of its small fat globules, which retard the creaming process—a fact which has designated her as the cheese-material cow.

She is medium in size, weighing about 1,000 pounds, and is usually red and white, or brown and white, the white predominating. She is a stylish, alert cow, the backward sweep of the horns giving her a distinguished appearance.

Keep Calves Well Bedded.

The stomach of the little calf is very sensitive and easily ruined. Nothing will do it quicker than keeping the animal confined in a wet, dirty pen. Clean the calf pen often and bed it with a liberal supply of dry straw oftener. It is no little labor to keep a stall where several calves run clean and dry, but there is no other way if you want to raise good calves. Eternal vigilance is the price of everything good in the stock line.

KEEPING BABIES IN HEALTH

Success of Tent Scheme Last Summer So Pronounced That It Will Be Repeated.

Mothers of little babies that suffered much from the intense heat in the early part of July last summer will be interested in the success of the "baby tent" scheme adopted in some of the big cities.

The tents are placed on flat roofs of tall buildings and in open lots, with eight little cradles or cots in each tent. When all was ready mothers of babies under two years were invited to leave them at the nearest available tent over night, so that the youngsters, in addition to enjoying the privilege of sleeping out of doors, could also receive the attention of trained nurses and doctors free.

Some of the tents have a perforated iron pipe extending along the ridge pole and connected with the city water supply. On very hot nights the water was turned on and allowed to stream down over the canvas. By evaporation it greatly reduced the temperature inside the tents. Some of the tents were also kept cool by the use of large blocks of ice in tubs before the entrance. Electric fans blew the cold air from the ice into the tents sufficiently to keep the babies comfortably cool.

This is the way some of the poor babies are being cared for, but the ideas could be utilized by any one who had the welfare of the baby at heart.

Needed No More Help.

An American gentleman got acquainted with a Frenchman who was very anxious to acquire the English language. The American in order to help him said that if he would send his exercises to him he would willingly correct them.

Nothing was heard from the Frenchman for some time, but finally a letter came couched in the following choice English:

"In small time I can learn so many English from his text-book and her dictionary as I think I will to come at the America and to go on the scaffold to lecture."

BURNING ITCH WAS CURED

"I deem it my duty to tell about a cure that the Cuticura Soap and Ointment have made on myself. My trouble began in splotches breaking out right in the edge of my hair on the forehead, and spread over the front part of the top of my head from ear to ear, and over my ears which caused a most fearful burning itch, or eczema.

"For three years I had this terrible breaking out on my forehead and scalp. I tried our family doctor and he failed to cure it. Then I tried the Cuticura Soap and Ointment and used them for two months with the result of a complete cure. Cuticura Soap and Ointment should have the credit due, and I have advised a lot of people to use them." (Signed) C. D. Therrington, Creek, N. C., Jan. 26, 1911.

Itching Scalp—Hair Fell Out.

"I will say that I have been suffering with an itching on my scalp for the past few years. My hair fell out in spots all over my head. My scalp started to trouble me with sores, then the sores healed up, and crusts formed on the top. Then the hair fell out and left me three bald spots the shape of a half dollar. I went to more than one doctor, but could not get any relief, so I started to use the Cuticura Remedies. I tried one bar of Cuticura Soap and some Cuticura Ointment, and felt relieved right away. Now the bald spots have disappeared, and my hair has grown, thanks to the Cuticura Soap and Ointment. I highly recommend the Cuticura Remedies to all that are suffering with scalp trouble." (Signed) Samuel Stern, 236 Floyd St., Brooklyn, N. Y., Feb. 7, 1911. Although Cuticura Soap and Ointment are sold by druggists and dealers everywhere, a sample of each, with 32-page book, will be mailed free on application to "Cuticura," Dept. L, Boston.

DEFENSE FUND IS CALLED FOR

CONVENTION OF STATE FEDERATION WILL BE ASKED TO AID BEUM AND MOONEY.

MR. M'EWEN'S ADDRESS

Secretary Urges Eight Hour Law for Women and Children—Pres. Hall Makes Annual Report—Gompers is praised.

Brainerd. — The thirtieth annual convention of the Minnesota State Federation of Labor was held here with a record attendance of 209 delegates. Mayor H. P. Dunn welcomed the visitors, and President E. G. Hall responded for the federation.

The report of W. E. McEwen, secretary-treasurer of the federation, was in the nature of a review of the work accomplished by labor generally, and the federation in particular during the past year. He referred in detail to the McNemare case and said that the trade unions of Minnesota gave liberally to the defense fund.

Minnesota Men Indicted.

"Among those indicted at Indianapolis were two members of local unions affiliated with this State Federation of Labor. Both of these men, Charles Beum, of Minneapolis, and Fred Mooney, of Duluth, have all along enjoyed a good reputation in the communities in which they live, and among their fellow workmen and colleagues in the labor movement.

Need Large Defense Fund.

"We, who know them, believe the government is in error and that they are innocent. In any event they are poor men who must depend upon their daily wage to provide for the livelihood of themselves and their families. They will be required to face trial in a strange city, before a strange jury, without friends and without funds. It is our bounden duty to see that they are provided with sufficient money to enable them to obtain, under such a handicap, a fair trial; to engage able counsel and to help them to take their witnesses from Minnesota to Indiana. Contributions for such a purpose will not serve to cheat justice but rather to aid it."

Speaking of the hours of labor Mr. McEwen said:

Should Extend State Law.

"There can be no question about the validity of the Minnesota law limiting the hours of labor for women and children in 'mercantile institutions, factories, workshops and mechanical establishments' to 58 hours per week. Our state law should be extended in its application to all classes of female laborers outside of the home. This convention ought to pass ringing resolutions calling upon the Legislature of Minnesota to extend the application of the present law, and to limit the number of hours for the employment of women and children in any industry in Minnesota to 8 hours per day."

Woman in Industry a Problem.

In his annual report, President Hall said that the organized working men and women of Minnesota are solidly behind every movement for the welfare of children.

BREAKS FOR LIBERTY.

Officer Follows Horse Thief Into Water; Pedestrain Trips Other.

Moorhead.—After successfully evading two posses, which chased them through a downpour of rain for more than seven miles, two men, who it is alleged stole a valuable farm team from Gust Runing on the principal business street, returned to Moorhead, and, after putting up the team in a Fargo barn, came to Moorhead. Officers found them in a North bridge saloon.

Officer George Jenkinson arrested George Miller as one of the men. After starting down the street Miller broke away and ran for the river, jumped in and began to swim, but Jenkinson followed and recaptured him. John Gisley, suspected of being the other thief, also was arrested. Both men were placed in jail.

Fifteen minutes later Gisley was free and running for the river in an effort to make the Dakota side. He had removed a number of bricks in a cell well and had twisted the bars sufficiently to make an opening for himself.

Gisley had 300 feet start when officers discovered his escape and started in pursuit. The chase led along the river bank and through the residence section of the park. Onlookers gathered and it was too dangerous to shoot. Chief O'Laughlin, 200 feet behind the fleeing man, called to people ahead of him to stop the man. Peter Mead heard him, and as Gisley passed him Mead stuck out his foot, Gisley tripped and fell, and Mead held him down until the officers arrived.

DUMAS STARTS FIGHT.

Stay of Sentence Sought for Former Cass Lake Mayor.

Bemidji.—Former Mayor Dumas of Cass Lake, whose conviction on the Puposky charge of attempted arson recently was upheld by the supreme court, has begun through his recently employed attorney, George H. Spear, of Grand Rapids, a new legal fight for liberty which will, if successful, delay his being sent to Stillwater.

Mr. Spear has secured from Judge W. S. McClelahan, who is now holding court at Bagley, an order addressed to Attorney General Smith and Special Prosecutor E. E. McDonald, of this city, to show cause why a stay of sentence should not be granted Dr. Dumas until the defendant has been granted a reasonable time in which to prepare and submit a motion for a new trial. That the state is determined to send Dr. Dumas to prison without further delay was shown when Attorney General Smith emphatically refused the request of the defendant for a stay of sentence.

STATE FAIR SEPT. 2-7.

Report of Agricultural Society Promise Much for This Year's Exhibit.

Hamline. — That Minnesota is the state of opportunities is proved by the facts compiled by the Minnesota State Agricultural Society. The material is presented in a neat booklet and shows the valuation of the annual farm products. Both in the gross and by counties. The $2,095,875 appropriation for school purposes alone, is a striking illustration of the prosperity of the state.

It is only when exhibits are made, such as one sees at the State Fair year, that the wonderful progress of Minnesota can be fully comprehended. With almost two million dollars worth of property at Hamline, the society will be better able to present in a concrete way at the State Fair this season, the facts which they have shown but vaguely in their report. The officials have set upon Sept. 2-7 as the date of the fair.

STATE LAND SALE.

Grand Rapids.—Nineteen hundred acres of state land were sold here to men who are planning to convert the uncultivated lands of northern Minnesota into fruitful farms. The land sold is scattered over practically all sections of Itasca county, the price ranging from $5 to $15 an acre, the highest price being paid by Henry H. Winslow, forest ranger of Northome, who purchased a tract on Island lake. The average price paid was $6.70 although several tracts ran from $13 to $15. Mr. Nelson reports the demand for land brisk all over northern Minnesota, the sales for June already having reached 16,000 acres.

RAILROAD LOSES SUIT.

Great Northern Compelled to Settle For Grain Lost.

Minneapolis. — The Northwestern Elevator company operating a grain elevator system extending over the entire Northwest, was victor in its case against the Great Northern involving losses in grain shipments to Duluth. Settlement of about $15,000 in claims was said to depend on the outcome. Out of more than 50 specified instances of loss, only one was decided for the railroad.

POUND TO EACH CHICKEN

This Will Enrich Minnesota Owners $1,000,000 Yearly, Says Expert.

Bemidji. — Farmers' day of University week, was enlivened by N. E. Chapman of the college of agriculture, who said that chicken raisers of Minnesota lose $1,000,000 annually by killing their chickens underweight.

"Add a pound to each chicken killed —and it easily can be done—and the owners will be enriched a million dollars a year," Mr. Chapman said.

ASKS DAMAGE OF ROAD.

Northfield Man Sustains Cuts; Asks For $3,000.

Red Wing. — The personal suit of John Street of Northfield against the Milwaukee road for $3,000 was opened for trial in district court. The plaintiff alleges that while alighting from a moving passenger train at Northfield he fell and sustained cuts about his head and body and that his collar bone was broken.

Christian Endeavorers Convene.

Duluth. — The annual meeting of the Minnesota Christian Endeavor union began here in the First Presbyterian church. A large party of delegates from over the state arrived on special train over the Great Northern at 6:30 p. m. The convention opened with a preparatory service for the state officers, led by W. D. Howell, a former field secretary for Minnesota. Delegates are arriving also for the state meeting for the Spanish-American war veterans which is here.

Four Dollars for a Cake of Soap.

Soap has never been considered an extravagance, but now that notion may change, since the new French imported soaps are costing from two to three and four dollars a cake. They are, however, deliciously scented; and one may take pardonable pleasure in using such toilet article. Each cake comes in a little box, and is satin covered; they are quite a suitable item for the traveling bag of the bride, for which the most exquisite trifles are always sought out.

Getting things without paying for them is some men's idea of economy.

A physician says: "Until last fall I used to eat meat for my breakfast and suffered with indigestion until the meat had passed from the stomach.

"Last fall I began the use of Grape-Nuts for breakfast and very soon found I could do without meat, for my body got all the nourishment necessary from the Grape-Nuts and since then I have not had any indigestion and am feeling better and have increased in weight.

"Since finding the benefit I derived from Grape-Nuts I have prescribed the food for all my patients suffering from indigestion or over-feeding and also for those recovering from disease where I want a food easy to take and certain to digest and which will not overtax the stomach.

"I always find the results I look for when I prescribe Grape-Nuts. For ethical reasons please omit my name." Name given by mail by Postum Co., Battle Creek, Mich.

The reason for the wonderful amount of nutriment, and the easy digestion of Grape-Nuts is not hard to find.

A stern father who had repeatedly told a young man who was paying his addresses to his daughter not to visit the house again without his permission, which he never intended to give, was surprised when he answered a ring at the doorbell late one evening to see the young man waiting on the step.

"Sir," said he in anger, "didn't I tell you not to call again, eh, sir?"

"Yes," said the young man. "I know, but I didn't call to see your daughter. I came on behalf of our firm about that little bill."

"Oh—er—er—" stammered the stern father, "call again, will you?"

STRANGEST COINCIDENCE IN HISTORY

TRUE STORY OF FOURTH OF JULY AND TWO GREAT MEN

THOMAS JEFFERSON

"MONTICELLO"—THE HOME OF THOMAS JEFFERSON

JOHN ADAMS

IN the early days of May, 1775, more than two score gentlemen wearing powdered pigtails, silk stockings, and wide-skirted coats, wended their way on horseback or in cumbersome, comfortless coaches from all sections of the country toward the city of Philadelphia. They were members of the Second Continental Congress, and they had a right to their grave faces, for Lexington and Concord had just been fought, and all of them knew the disgusting details of the old British law of treason.

Among those men were two whose fates from that time forward were to be linked in strange fashion. One of them rode down from the north, the other up from the south. The northerner was a somewhat sour-visaged man, nearing the age of forty, whose big wig and the legalistic turn of his talk betrayed the fact that he was a disciple of the then living Blackstone. Somewhat inclined to be irascible, censorious and vain, he was yet a man of high public character and pure private morals—a diluted Puritan, viewing the world through the Puritan's suspicious and somewhat jaundiced vision. It was the second time that he had ridden down to Philadelphia, for he had been a member of the First Continental Congress, in which his knowledge of affairs, patriotic convictions, high courage and keen legal mind had given him an honorable place.

The man who rode up from the south was younger by seven years, slender of frame, with freckled skin, curly red hair and hazel gray eyes that betrayed a kindly yet withal a determined spirit. Though a Virginia gentleman of large means, he displayed a disposition toward what in later days was called "democratic simplicity." He brought with him a reputation for science, literature and a happy talent for composition. It was whispered that, in addition to the classics, he understood Spanish, French, Italian, was learning German and contemplated studying Gaelic; that he knew how to calculate an eclipse, plan a building, set a broken bone, try a lawsuit, and dance the minuet. Those of his fellow-members who came to know him intimately discovered that he was, in addition, a most agreeable and considerate companion, that he was passionately fond of playing the violin, and that occasionally he wrote poetry.

These men were John Adams and Thomas Jefferson. They speedily became friends. Adams wrote of his fellow-member: "He was so prompt, frank, explicit and decisive upon committees and in conversation that he soon won my heart."

A year passed, and the revolt that was begun to preserve our rights as Englishmen ripened into revolution. The time came when a separation that already existed in fact must be formally recognized in name also. And upon the roll of the committee of five named to prepare the declaration of that fact to the world stood the names of Thomas Jefferson and John Adams.

Jefferson wrote the immortal document, but the task of defending it before the Congress fell chiefly upon the doughty Adams. And well did he perform it. "He was our Colossus on the floor," wrote Jefferson in grateful acknowledgement.

Unlike as Jefferson and Adams were in temperament, training, and political ideals, those anxious days of association in a noble work created a bond of sympathy that time nor all the bitterness of party strife could not destroy.

For some years, however, their paths lay in different places. It was not until they represented their infant country at two European courts that they were again thrown into close association. When the Adamses visited Paris in 1785 they were frequently entertained by Jefferson, and the relations between the two families were so friendly that Abigail Adams wrote: "I shall really regret to leave Mr. Jefferson; he is one of the choice ones of earth." Subsequently, in describing the difficulties of her husband's position at an unfriendly court, she said: "In Mr. Jefferson he has a firm and faithful friend with whom he can consult and advise . . . They have unlimited confidence in each other."

Our twain were next brought into close association in the administration of Washington—Adams as vice-president and Jefferson as secretary of state. And then began an unfortunate "rift within the lute."

Adams, though of rather plebeian birth, inclined to aristocracy; he believed that the "rich, the well-born and the able" ought to rule. Shabbily as he had been treated while minister at the court of St. James, he sympathised with monarchical Britain in her struggle with [illegible] France. [illegible] setting up aristocracies and monarchies had our forefathers emigrated to America, subdued the wilderness and won independence. "Born free and equal" was a phrase that must have concrete reality.

Against the aristocratic tendencies that he saw about him Jefferson set himself to fight with a quiet but grim earnestness. For a time, however, the Adams-Hamilton party triumphed. Adams was elected president to succeed Washington; Jefferson was forced to be content with the vice-presidency. Then came the quasi-war with France, and with it a decided reaction against Jeffersonian republicanism. But in the pride of their might the Federalists overreached themselves in the fatal alien and sedition acts, while Adams bravely refused to be pushed into an unnecessary war with France by the reckless Hamiltonians. By so doing he wrecked his party, but rendered his country the greatest service of his career. Years later he said: 'I desire no other inscription over my gravestone than this: "Here lies John Adams, who took upon himself the responsibility of the peace with France in the year 1800."'

During these years the friends frequently reminded each other that there was nothing personal in their political conflicts. But personal pique inevitably crept in, and neither was always able to refrain from attacking the other. His defeat in the election of 1800 was a great blow to Adams. Deprived of the coveted second term, he behaved with a pettiness that was out of keeping with his real greatness. After putting Federalists in every vacancy on which he could lay his hands, he shook the dust of the capital off his feet, and on the early morning of March 4, 1801, before his triumphant enemies were astir, drove off northward without waiting to see his successor installed in office. It was seemingly a final sad ending to a friendship between two men who, each in his own way, were as sterling patriots as ever lived.

But time works great changes. Jefferson's administration, especially during the first few years, proved so successful that most Federalists turned Republicans. Though he had bitter enemies who even plotted the formation of a "Northeastern Confederacy," they were not numerous enough to figure largely in the election returns. After all, Adams hated Hamilton and his satellites far more than he hated Jefferson. His son, John Quincy Adams, unable to swallow such British outrages as that committed by the "Leopard" on the "Chesapeake," severed his relations with the feeble remnant of the pro-British Federalists and became a Republican. When Timothy Pickering published a pamphlet arraigning the administration, John Adams replied to it, thus appearing as a supporter of Jefferson's policy.

In 1804, Jefferson lost his "ever dear daughter," Mary. "I, of my want," he wrote sadly, "have lost even the half of all I had. My evening prospects now hang on the slender thread of a single life."

The news proved too much for great-hearted Abigail Adams. Without her husband's knowledge, she wrote Jefferson a letter of condolence, in which kind feeling, goodness of heart and a proud, unforgiving spirit were curiously commingled.

Jefferson's reply was that of a noble man to a noble woman. After thanking her in suitable language, he made an earnest effort to revive the perishing friendship between the two families. Several letters were exchanged, but the wounds the Adamses believed they had received still smarted, and cordial relations were not then restored.

In 1811 Dr. Benjamin Rush of Philadelphia expressed to Jefferson a desire to bring about a reconciliation, and Jefferson gladly embraced it. In a letter to Rush he said many complimentary things of Adams, and added that [illegible] lives." Thus encouraged, Rush addressed to the two fellow-laborers in the cause of freedom an eloquent appeal to bedew their "letters of reconciliation with tears of affection and joy."

The hopes of the peacemaker were realized. Although Adams answered the appeal in a facetious and somewhat deprecatory letter, he ended with a half promise to comply with Rush's wishes. Taking as an excuse the sending of some specimens of New England homespun, he wrote a friendly letter to his old comrade and rival.

The joy with which Jefferson received this overture is visible in every line of his happily worded reply. Without even waiting for the arrival of the homespun, he hastened to write an answer that in part was as follows:

"A letter from you calls up recollections very dear to my mind. It carries me back to the times when, beset with difficulties and dangers, we were fellow-laborers in the same cause, struggling for what is most valuable to man, his right of self-government. Laboring always at the same oar, with some wave ever ahead threatening to overwhelm us, and yet passing harmless under our bark, we knew not how, we rode through the storm with heart and hand, and made a happy port.

"Of the signers of the Declaration of Independence, I see now living not more than half a dozen on your side of the Potomac, and, on this side, myself alone.

"You and I have been wonderfully spared, and myself with remarkable health, and a considerable activity of body and mind. I am on horseback three or four hours of every day; visit three or four times a year a possession I have ninety miles distant, performing the winter journey on horseback. I walk little, however, a single mile being too much for me; and I live in the midst of my grandchildren, one of whom has lately promoted me to be a great-grandfather. I have heard with pleasure that you also retain good health, and a greater power of exercise in walking than I do. But I would rather have heard this from yourself, and that, writing a letter of mine, full of egotisms and of details of your health, your habits, occupations and enjoyments, I should have the pleasure of knowing that in the race of life you do not keep, in its physical decline, the same distance ahead of me which you have done in political honors and achievements."

Thenceforward no cloud was ever allowed to come between them. Both had wrongs to forgive and forget, but they did it nobly. Though they never again saw each other in the flesh, they wrote long and frequent letters, telling of their daily lives and discussing politics, religion, philosophy and other topics.

In one of Jefferson's letters occurred what seems almost a prophecy of something strange to come. "The simultaneous movements in our correspondence," he wrote, "have been remarkable on several occasions. It would seem as if the state of the air, or the state of the times, or some other unknown cause, produced a sympathetic effect on our mutual recollections." Could it be that between these two great minds there existed a sort of mental telepathy? At all events, a more touching intimacy of patriotic souls was never beheld. In the fulness of years and of honors, did these two venerable patriarchs, once friends, then enemies and now again friends, march in concord down the path of time toward a day that was to link their names yet closer in a glorious immortality.

Eight years passed. Jefferson was eighty-three and Adams ninety, yet both retained the full enjoyment of their faculties. It was the year 1826, the fiftieth anniversary of the nation's birth. Throughout the land great preparations were making to observe the national holiday. Party feeling was sunk in common love of country, and the attention of the public was [illegible] turned toward these venerable [illegible] who, with Chas. Carroll of Carrollton, [illegible] the sole survivors of the signers [illegible] in the [illegible] health [illegible] obedience to wills that had not flinched before the wrath of kings.

On the thirtieth of June, the orator for the celebration at Quincy called upon Adams in his home and asked for a toast. "I give you," said the feeble patriarch, "Independence forever!" Asked if he desired to add anything to the sentiment, the old hero replied: "Not a word."

The great day dawned and John Adams still lived. But the candle had burned to its socket and could give but a feeble flicker. "'Tis a great day! 'Tis a good day!" he said to the anxious relatives who surrounded his bed. Reason wavered, but the fluttering mind in its last earthly moments recalled the friend of Monticello—the old comrade who had stood with him shoulder to shoulder in the fight for freedom. "Thomas Jefferson still survives," he murmured in a voice so feeble that the last syllables were scarcely distinguishable. Those were his last words. His spirit departed with the descending sun.

He died in error. Thomas Jefferson did not survive. For days the good Democrat had felt the approach of death and had prepared for it, desiring only that he might live until the Fourth. On the third the stupor into which he had fallen became almost continuous. 'Ah, doctor," he said, awakening in the night, "are you still there Is it is Fourth?" 'It soon will be," answered the physician. As midnight approached those watching noted anxiously the passing of the minutes, hoping and praying that the feeble thread might hold and death be hallowed by the great anniversary. The wish was granted. Not until fifty minutes past the meridian did the soul of the great commoner exchange immortalities.

It was before the days of telegraphs and railroads. The news spread slowly. Five days elapsed ere the denizens of Baltimore and Washington learned of what had happened at Braintree. Meantime the inhabitants of Virginia and neighboring states mourned the death of Jefferson, marveling greatly over the strange coincidence that one who had been the author of the Declaration should die upon the fiftieth anniversary of its adoption.

Then came the news from the north, and men realized that not one but two patriarchs of liberty had departed on the day when hearts were bounding with joy over blessings which sires of a former age had handed down—that almost simultaneously these two had been translated in the midst of the acclamations of millions to the judgment of their God. Had steeds and chariots of fire descended to take up these partners in earthly fame and coheirs of eternity it might perhaps have been more wonderful but not more glorious.

As the news spread over the land to the villages and the hamlets, "it raised everywhere a thrill of emotion, such as has never been caused by any public event. It was not the wail of grief, such as is drawn forth by the sense of privation by the loss of valuable lives. The advanced age of the persons, if nothing else, neutralized that. It was the offspring of the mixture of feelings, the chief of which was the surprise at the strangeness of the occurrence, veneration for the men themselves, and delight in the splendor which it would reflect upon a page of the national annals. Certainly the fabulous passing away of the first Roman king, nearly on the same anniversary, in the midst of elementary chaos, does not compare with it in grandeur. Men loved to meet each other and to dwell on the most minute particulars, as they were sedulously laid before the public by the newspapers, and to read the comments raised to unusual eloquence by the tone of the general mind."

"Never has it fallen to the lot of any commander," wrote the adjutant general, "to announce to an army such an event as now calls forth the mingled grief and astonishment of the republic. Never since history first wrote the first record of time has one day thus mingled every triumph with every tender emotion, and consecrated a nation's joy by blending it with the most sacred of sorrows."

For weeks the newspapers contained little else but descriptions of the lives and deaths of the departed patriots. In every city in the land memorial meetings searched sacred and profane history for a parallel. Of the hundreds of such orations one at least will survive, Webster's classic on "Adams and Jefferson." In his message to Congress, the noble son of a noble father, in calling attention to the country's loss, reverently announced that "the time, the manner, the coincidence are visible and palpable marks of Divine favor, for which I would humble myself in grateful and silent adoration before the Ruler of the Universe."

Nor was such language extravagant. The passing of the two patriots formed not only the strangest coincidence in the annals of [illegible]

AN IDEAL ISLAND

Romance of Centuries Hangs About Porto Rico

One Hundred Years Before Jamestown Arose From Wilderness the Spaniards Were Living on This Gem of the Indies.

San Juan, Porto Rico.—Quaint and picturesque and heavy with the romance of four centuries as a possession of the superstitious and fiery Spaniard is Porto Rico, to which Edward M. Bainter, principal of the Central high school of this city, goes next month as commissioner of education. As the reader is aware, Porto Rico became a colony of the United States at the end of the Spanish-American war, and a wonderful development has taken place in the tropical island the 14 years since.

Porto Rico had been settled a century by Europeans before Jamestown was founded or the Dutch sailed up the Hudson river. The second century had begun before the Pilgrim fathers waded from the Mayflower to the dry Massachusetts shores. Closely associated with its early history are the names of Juan Ponce de Leon, Nicholas de Onando, Diego, Columbus, Drake, Hawkins, Lord Cumberland, Salazar, Sotomeyer and others whose struggles with the rebellious Indians, marauding Caribs, pirates and buccaneers in their attacks on the primitive city of San Juan and other more defenseless settlements furnish a story replete with adventure, warfare and romance.

Christopher Columbus touched at Porto Rico on his second famous voyage to the new world. Ponce de Leon, he of the search for the waters of everlasting youth, built the first town upon it and called it San Juan. San Juan became the capital of the island in 1508, and today holds the same position. It is a typical Spanish city.

If the traveler is fortunate he will sail into San Juan bay in the early morning when, against a gorgeous tropical sunrise, the blue of the ocean, the gray and moss covered walls, the white parapets of Casa Blanca and the many tinted dwellings rising terrace like from the bay to the heights overlooking the sea form a riot of colors. On the other side of the harbor vivid green cane fields, interspersed with dark tinted palms, the soft colors of an occasional settlement and the background range upon range of hills still enveloped in the purple shadows of the dawn, complete the beauty of the scene.

Luxurient Vegetation in Porto Rico.

The sound of the sunrise gun booms forth from the grim and battle scarred ramparts of old Morro, the impregnable fortress which the cannon balls of many nations have failed to crumble, as the ship approaches the narrow entrance to the land locked harbor. Passing the grey and ancient city wall, its heights crowned by the barracks, Casa Blanca, the residence of the military commander and Santa Cataline palace, now the headquarters of the civil administration and the residence of the governor of the island, in which Mr. Bainter will have a home, the vessel threads its way between buoys marking the channel. Across the harbor the quaint fishing village of Palo Seco is seen in a grove of cocoanuts, and farther along the beach Catano, another small village, the delicately tinted houses from a distance adding to the charm of the picture.

WOMAN IS CHASED BY MOOSE

Husband Kills Animal, Which, It Is Believed, Escaped From the Whitney Preserve.

Pittsfield, Mass.—As Mrs. Lawrence Clement was leaving her house at Becket recently a big bull moose suddenly appeared in the front yard and chased her into the barn. She was so frightened she fell to the barn floor in a faint.

Mr. Clement, who is a constable, was near by and hastened by a back route to the house for his shotgun. He killed the moose as it darted for a thicket.

The moose weighed at least one thousand pounds. Mrs. Clement was under the care of a physician tonight. It is believed the moose is one that escaped from Harry Payne Whitney's preserve on October mountain, last [illegible]

THE SUNBEAM.

MINNESOTA HISTORICAL SOCIETY.

VOL. XII. SUNBEAM, PENNINGTON COUNTY, MINNESOTA, FRIDAY, JULY 5, 1912. NO. 15.

Tiny Shop Spikes Wheel of Commerce

CHICAGO.—"The march of commerce" from time to time has pursued divers courses to obviate a halt, or the semblance of a halt, but it has fallen to the lot of one of Chicago's large wholesale concerns to employ, probably for the first time, a course which is marching around, under and over the threatening obstacle.

The obstacle encountered by expanding commerce in this instance is the person of John F. Walsh and his little hardware store, located midway between North Canal street and the Chicago river, on the south side of West Lake street.

As a simon-pure adherent to standpatism John Walsh has completely eclipsed the late originator of that term.

Now, John Walsh is not clinging to the policies of any particular political coterie, but is standing pat firmly in his little shop, which is a lone remaining section of a once fairly large building.

His legal or moral right to stand firm on the privileges of his five-year lease of the 25x40 foot shop is disputed by no one, although a mammoth building now in the course of construction must have the few feet occupied by Walsh's shop if the northern face of the structure, when completed, is to present an unbroken front.

"Perhaps they thought I would take an afternoon off, tie my lease up with pretty pink ribbon and carry it over to them on a silver tray, decorated with American Beauty roses."

"Well, you see how badly they were mistaken. I'll have no truck with them. I'm here to stick. I've my lease and it runs for trhree years yet."

Now Walsh is being builded around on all sides, top and bottom, except the front, which will remain his very own, free and unchallenged, until the expiration of the lease, and "the march of commerce" goes on unhalted.

Poodle Cause of Death and Arrests

MINNEAPOLIS, MINN.—One little white French poodle attacked a Minneapolis policeman the other night. The policeman shot the poodle. The poodle's mistress attacked the policeman. A riot call was put in for the police.

The poodle, cause of all the trouble, was "Snoozlums," pet of Mrs. Bertha Forslund. The policeman who was attacked and who shot "Snoozlums" was Police Driver David Melbouff, and the man whose championship of the poodle resulted in his own arrest gave the name of Robert Bronsman at central station.

Policeman Melbouff, who is driver at the South Side station, was riding home on a bicycle at 10 p. m. According to his story the poodle ran from the walk and seized him by the leg of the trousers.

It was at this stage of the conflict, according to Policeman Melbouff, when he was complete master of the field, that Mrs. Forslund appeared on the scene.

"You have killed my pet. You have killed my baby, 'Snoozlums,'" the woman is said to have shrieked as she stepped over the body of the fallen poodle and toward the policeman, who, busy with the trousers which had been torn, was somewhat at a disadvantage.

"I didn't want to hit the woman," said Policeman Melbouff, "so I just held her off."

About this time, according to Melbouff, Robert Bronsman took a hand in the fray. This made things easier for Melbouff for Bronsman was not a woman. The battle raged merrily.

In the meantime neighbors, hearing the barks of "Snoozlums," the shot, the screams of the woman, had turned in riot calls for the police.

Leaving "Snoozlums" where he lay in the street the police took the man and woman in the patrol wagon and to central station, where charges of disorderly conduct were placed against both.

Uncle Tom Bloodhounds Are Eaters

ST. LOUIS.—Four large hounds, possessed of appetites commensurate with their size, are perplexing William U. Halbert, of Belleville, public administrator of St. Clair county, Illinois. The dogs formerly belonged to an "Uncle Tom's Cabin" show owned by E. C. Chunn, who died in East St. Louis several months ago, and Halbert says they rapidly are eating up all that is left of the estate.

The hounds, each one of which stands a few hands shorter than a small pony have healthy appetites.

When Halbert first came into possession of the dogs the rest of the estate of the one-time owner of the show was intact, and he even could afford to buy porterhouse for the animals if they insisted on having it. Halbert hadn't had charge of the estate long, however, when the dead owner's father, J. C. Chunn, filed a claim for the personal effects of his son. These personal effects consisted of a passenger coach and scenery and other paraphernalia necessary to the show.

Halbert fought the giving up of the passenger coach with the idea that if the worst came to the worst he could house the hounds in it and ship them from place to place that they might "board around" on their relatives. He lost the suit, however, and found himself the mortified possessor of the dogs, which, after the manner of their kind, lost no time in signifying they would be pleased to sit down to a good meal.

So far they have cost him more than $100, and none of them has indicated he is ready to get old and die or quit eating just because the novelty has worn off.

Frisco Laborers Find a Wine Cellar

FER ONCT WE FEEL LIKE TH' RICH —

SAN FRANCISCO.—That men may drink champagne on a steam beer salary has received convincing proof. Around the ruins of the Grand Hotel at Stevenson and New Montgomery streets were a lot of $2-a-day laborers the other day who were nursing assorted "heads," but who were very happy just the same.

During the work of clearing the ruins an old rock crusher that stood on the lot was toppled over under the instructions of the foreman. The foreman, the day being hot, then adjourned to a nearby buffet to quench his thirst. When he returned to the field he found that every man jack of his laborers had disappeared.

Their coats were still hanging around on fences and the foreman was puzzled, not having reason to believe there had been a walk-out, until the sound of popping corks, coming from the near distance, mingled with gusty laughter, attracted his attention to where the rock crusher had stood. [illegible] of the wine cellar that had been exposed, drinking the cream of the choice stock of liquors that had made the old Grand hotel bar famous.

After the wreck of the hotel in 1906 no one gave a thought to the wine cellar and the stock of old wines, assuming that the stock had been ruined.

Colonel Kirkpatrick of the Palace, when advised of the find and asked what disposition he wanted made of the wines, said:

"Let the laborers dispose of it. The wine is theirs by right of discovery."

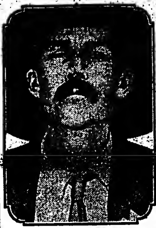
DUKE OF ORLEANS IS HARD UP

In the diplomatic and social world in London it is believed that the duke of Orleans, who aspires to be king of France and keeps on wire pulling to that end, must be a bit short of ready cash. Otherwise no one believes that he would have sold his famous estate of Wood Norton, "the home of exiles," as he has just done, the buyer being an English judge, Sir Charles Swinfen Eady, writes a London correspondent of the St. Louis Globe-Democrat.

How much his worship paid his highness for Wood Norton it has proved impossible to learn, but it must have been a tidy sum, for the house itself is furnished with a magnificence in keeping with the royal state which the pretender to the throne of France has kept up there, and the property, which is located near Evesham, in the valley of the Avon, extends over 2,500 acres and takes in several parishes. The mansion, which is a handsome one, with many gables, will need a lot of alteration inside to make it a suitable home for an English magistrate, everything, from the door handles and the electric fittings to the oak panelings, being emblazoned with the fleur-de-lis of the royal house of France.

DECLARES OROZCO HAS FAILED



Gen. Branlio Hernandez, formerly a leader in both of the Mexican revolutions, is now in the United States, practically an exile from his own country.

At present General Hernandes is at outs both with the government under Madero, which has had him indicted on a charge of conspiracy, and with Orosco, the revolutionary leader.

"The revolution is not a separate one from that which made Madero president," he said. "But Madero betrayed the trust of the people after becoming president by allying himself with the wealthy class and the corporations—what you call the trusts. At last the people arose to demand what they expected from the revolution that ended in the overthrow of Diaz.

"Orosco was not with us then. Later he joined us. Then the trusts, seeing they would lose, decided to divide, half of them going to the aid of Orozco, who was very popular then. I pleaded with him not to accept their services, but he would not listen. Now the people are fighting, but not with the same spirit."

Hernandez asserts the principles for which the present revolutionists have been fighting are revision of the codes and complete reformation of the whole judiciary system, practical and general education.

SCHOOL FOR MOTHERS OPENED

And now we have a School of Mothercraft. It is a New York institution and is probably the only one of its kind in the world; certainly it is the only one in the United States.

Its director is Mary L. Read, who is also its originator, and among those interested in it is a list of women which might well be mistaken for an extract from the Social Register—all of them enthusiastic, helpful and convinced that in the new institution something has arisen which will very greatly tend to help the nation.

Regarding the objects of the school Miss Read said:

"The objects of the school are to provide a competent, a very practical and scientifically true course of instruction in those things which will enable the mother to make of her children the healthiest, best educated and most honorable citizens. The school goes further than that, indeed, for it aims also to help her to produce, in the first place, the right kind of a child on which to work. The practice of biology in the family includes eugenics as well as the care of the infant and the growing child. There is as much for the unmarried girl as for the married woman to learn, for the right study of eugenics will show her how and whom to marry and how and whom not to marry.

HEADS "BIG SISTERS" SOCIETY

The organization in New York of Big Sisters, formed to work on the lines of the now eight-year-old society of Big Brothers, is the result of the individual effort of Mrs. William K. Vanderbilt in the children's court.

The society has already more than a hundred members, has an office in the suite occupied by the Big Brothers, at 200 Fifth avenue, with a secretary and assistant secretary to attend to the clerical work, and to be always at the court whenever it is in session and look after little girls who need assistance when the members of the society are not able to be present.

Mrs. Vanderbilt, whose practical charitable work is illustrated in the apartment homes, with the maximum amount of sun and air, which she had put up for people with incipient cases of tuberculosis, began her visits to the children's court about two years ago. There she found representatives of Jewish and Catholic organizations doing [illegible] members, but no one from the Protestant [illegible] children [illegible]

All Think They Could Do it Better

TH' COUNTRY IS GOIN' TO TH' DOGS — I NEVER SAW TH' LIKE — TH' REVELATIONS ARE ASTOUNDING !!

WASHINGTON.—Every time a business man visits Washington the idea comes to him of how much more easily and economically he could run Uncle Sam's business than it is now conducted. In a way it is one of those cases where "any sort of an individual could run a newspaper, or fill a public office, or preach a sermon or do almost anything in which the public feels a proprietary interest." The American visiting Washington feels that he is in a way looking after his own property, when he looks upon the buildings and sees how things are going.

A prominent New York manufacturer, in Washington on a visit, was shaking his head as he walked down the avenue toward his hotel. "Proof of the futility of paternalism, government ownership and socialism," he declared with a wave of the hand, "is evidenced in observing closely the operation of the business affairs of the government as contrasted with that by individuals, especially in the matter of economy and cost of operation. The higher cost incurred in building battleships is but an illustration.

"Why," he exclaimed, wrathfully, "the revelations are simply astounding. The legal red tape of governmental affairs is something exasperating. If there is a labor-saving device introduced, it requires an endless amount of regulation. The quick, decisive action of business executive and initiative force is utterly lacking."

Another startling fact was revealed that some of the most learned bureau chiefs in Washington are receiving no greater salary than efficient shipping clerks in private enterprises. "It seems to me," concluded the business man tersely, "that when the comparative cost of the same work in the government and in private enterprises are considered, need is shown of at least more acceleration and elasticity in the conduct of governmental business if it is to be kept in line with modern commercial methods."—Chapple's News-Letter.

Habits of Forbearance to Be Taught

WARFARE is to be ended for all time, at least so far as the United States is concerned, and the standard of citizenship in this country is to be put on a higher plane than ever before by a course of study in good will which is devised for the elementary schools throughout this country. Such, at least, is the hope of those who have formulated the course. A complete outline of the topics covered in this new school subject has just been issued by the United States bureau of education.

In the lower grades, according to the bureau of education's program, the child is trained in habits of forbearance, consideration, gentleness and self-control, while in the latter grades emphasis is laid upon the principles of the world peace movement.

Thus in the first grade the child learns the treatment he should give his companions and pets. The second grade deals with home life; the third, with school and play time, while the fourth takes up the home town or city. In grade five the course broadens to include a consideration of the whole country; in the sixth, the child takes up good citizenship; in the seventh he studies the world family, and in the last he learns what the larger patriotism means.

In this way the child grows up in the understanding that good will, which he must show his friends and parents, should be extended to all the inhabitants of the earth. He begins by learning that he must be kind to animals and playmates, because he is in constant relations with them; then he comes to understand that this nation should be at peace with all others, because all nations are interdependent, and this finally leads to the last topic in the whole long course—the united world.

The moral qualities essential to the world peace movement, such as faithfulness, generosity, gratitude, hospitality, fair play, honesty, and consideration for others, are emphasized.

U. S. Cavalry Has New Appliances

NEW appliances and equipment are now being furnished to the United States cavalry. Not satisfied with giving the troopers the field wireless telegraph plant, the Maxim silencer, the automatic machine gun and other equipment, the war department is going a step further.

Hereafter cavalry troopers are to be equipped with pocket electric lights and luminous field compasses. The bayonet is also to be added to the trooper's equipment, so that in effect, unhorsed, he will be as efficient as an infantryman.

Due to the extended need for foreign service on the part of the troops, and to the superior mobility of the cavalry arm in the foreign field, the United States is making extensive additions to the field conveniences of the troopers.

Each troop commander is hereafter to be supplied with one pocket electric flashlight, five inches long and covered with durable leather. This is on the recommendation of the cavalry equipment board. It is believed that the light will be useful to troop commanders in conducting night operations with other troops, or even independent night operations on a small scale, in reading dispatches, examining crossings and banks of streams before fording.

The lights to be supplied have been so covered as to be proof against wet weather and tropical temperatures.

How Statesman Was Rendered Hatless

GOOD JOKE HA-HA

ONE of those unfortunate cases of mistaken identity between hats occurred a few days ago in the house cloak room. "Billy" Kent, the reform member from California, who wears the orneriest looking hat in Washington, walked off with a dome-covering that belonged to Ira Copley of Illinois. While the Copley hat was in Kent's possession an accident befell it, and Copley declares that he wouldn't wear it to a masquerade. He and Kent were classmates at Yale, and he felt free to tell him that he thought he should be reimbursed for the ruined hat. Kent and Copley each own several dray loads of money, but it was the principle of the thing.

"It isn't the first time that you have rendered me more or less hatless," said Copley. "I remember one time some 25 years ago that you threw a snowball at me, when I was passing along on the opposite side of the street attending strictly to my own affairs, as was my wont. And my brand new derby hat looked like a be[illegible] [illegible] again you compel me to go to the hat store and squander my savings or else join the hatless brigade and be thought eccentric or poetical."

"Ah, yes," replied Kent, "I, too, recall that snowball incident. And that is why I shall not pay so much as one cent toward a new hat for you. Not one cent shall I pay." And he snapped his fingers defiantly. "I knocked off your hat, 'tis true. Whereupon I bought you a new hat. You meanwhile had bought one and charged it to me. And furthermore, your hat wasn't ruined after all, as you had it repaired and wore it long after newer styles labeled 'Nobby' were being exhibited in the windows."

SYNDICATING KINDLINESS.

Congress has declined to incorporate the hundred million dollar Rockefellar philanthropic trust, and perhaps it is just as well; not so much because the trust might in the dim future somehow menace the liberties of the people, as because the refusal is indirectly a blow at the tendency of the time to syndicate and organise all altruistic endeavor. Individualism is what we should encourage in this field, says the Columbia (S. C.) State. The syndication method excels, perhaps, in "efficiency," if one appraises philanthropy by the rate and degree in which it translates good will on the one hand into relief and uplift on the other. But we have never understood that the good of the recipient was the whole of a gift's blessings. Well-doing at second hand is not comparable with well-doing that requires individual thought, anxiety and self-denial. One's sense of humanity and his powers of compassion atrophy under the syndication system, but where one performs himself the maximum of kindly acts, philanthropic virtue is constantly being elicited, exercised and matured. It is good to see a tendency checked which in its logical extension would cause people to repose a smug content in the doing of good on the installment plan, as they might pay for a piece of furniture.

Philosophy is, as somebody has said, merely a more than usually determined effort to think clearly. Human nature seems to have been endowed with a restless curiosity about the great problems of existence. Most of us do more or less desultory thinking about them, and to that extent are philosophers. The ancient Greeks were the first to consider the problems serious and they brought to bear on them the keenest sort of intelligence. Since their time other keen minds in all ages have been concerned with them. When we get a new idea, for instance, we often feel as if we had known it all the time, only it had never come to the surface before in our minds and been recognized before. Does this mean that somehow all fragments of it come to consciousness? We describe a certain table as smooth. But looked at through a microscope it seems rough. A still more powerful glass might radically change its appearance. Which is the real table? What is behind the data that our senses give us? We wonder where we come from and what the real meaning of life is. These and similar problems come up at times in the minds of most persons, whether students of philosophy or not, says the Kansas City Star. A consideration of such questions certainly tends to widen the horizon, and to give a possible background to existence.

The New York Telephone Company has given twenty of its office men outside work as solicitors, and has supplied the vacancies created in their former positions by engaging women, who will be known as cashiers. Their business is to handle the large sums in nickels, dimes and quarters which reach the offices of the company from pay stations in different parts of the city. It is stated by officials of the company that they have found women more reliable and less inclined to yield to temptation than men in handling cash. And yet there are men who assert that women have no sense of business honor.

A New York judge has decided that the car company must settle if a sleeping passenger's trousers are stolen from his berth at a station through a window. The company ought to be required, also, to carry an extra pair of trousers for the relief of the passenger in case of such an embarrassing occurrence.

26 BALLOTS CAST WITHOUT ANY RESULT

New Jerseyite's Vote Run to 407½—Missourian Drops to 436½—Dark Horse.

Baltimore, Md. — With Governor Woodrow Wilson gaining on each ballot and Speaker Champ Clark constantly losing ground in the race for the presidential nomination, the Democratic national convention at 11:05 o'clock Saturday night adjourned until Monday at 11 o'clock.

Twenty-six ballots had been taken since the first call of the states and there was no hope of a final verdict. It is against all political precedent for a national convention to sit on Sunday, but that day was a day of important conferences among the party leaders and a day of hard work for the campaign managers.

The ballot Saturday ran from the thirteenth to the twenty-sixth. Wilson began at 355 and ended at 407½, a net gain during the day of 51 votes. Speaker Clark began at 554 and fell to 453½, a loss of 91 votes. The anti-Clark leaders in the convention called attention to the fact that this almost exactly offset the 90 votes given to Clark by the New York delegation. Breaks to Governor Wilson were coming from many different delegations as the balloting closed. His managers believed that once he had overtaken Speaker Clark the switching of delegates would be complete. The Clark forces made a desperate effort Sunday to win back some of the delegates lost Sunday and in this they had the personal direction of the speaker himself.

WOODROW WILSON.

The Wilson forces, in the meantime, were fighting not only to hold their gains of yesterday, but to induce more to desert the other candidates.

Senator Stone of Missouri made a motion to eliminate the candidate receiving the lowest number of votes on each succeeding ballot after the twenty-seventh, until only one—the winner—was left in the race. There was a storm of objection and the subject was pressed no further.

The Harmon delegates from Ohio threw their support to Speaker Clark on several ballots, but they did not materially help him toward the necessary two-thirds vote because of the gradual inroads made by Wilson. They then changed back to Harmon and remained there until the last ballot of the evening.

The dark horse attempt was made when Mayor Fitzgerald of Boston cast 34 of the state's 35 votes for Eugene Noble Foss, governor of the state. The convention was not in a compromise mood and Fitzgerald was denied the five minutes he asked, on unanimous consent, although it was known that he wanted to place the name of Foss formally before the convention.

Foss stretched the 34 votes start Massachusetts had given him into 43 and held it there, but could get no further.

And so the convention was left.

Bryan is a factor that no one can reckon on. Bryan has sprung an average of one sensation a day since the convention started in.

Speaker Champ Clark broke with William Jennings Bryan, Sunday. Hastening over from Washington, intending personally to denounce the Nebraskan in the convention for Bryan's charge that Clark had "dealt" with Tammany to obtain the presidential nomination Clark arrived here to find the session adjourned. He conferred with his lieutenants and issued a statement demanding that Bryan retract the aspersion that Clark had entered into an alliance with the privilege-seeking interests. The statement is as follows:

Saturday in the national convention an outrageous aspersion was cast upon me and through me upon the democratic party by one who, of all men ought to be the last to besmudge or betray his friends or his party.

"So far as I am personally concerned, it is enough to say that the charge which reflects upon my personal or party integrity is utterly and absolutely false. I might afford to forget myself, but I am by the choice of the democratic majority of the house of representatives, the ranking official democrat in national public life. I cannot be false or corrupt without reflecting upon my party in the most serious way.

"Any man who enters into an alliance with any selfish interest or privileged class of this country to gain the nomination for the presidency is unworthy of the presidency and the speakership of the house. I have not entered into such an alliance and the democrat, however distinguished, who charges me with this act, is a traitor to the democratic party and to his professed friendship for me.

"I am not here to plead for a nomination or to defend any man's political action. I ask no undue consideration from any man, be he friend or foe, but I demand exact justice from every democrat either in this convention or throughout the nation.

"With William J. Bryan and his charge made in the convention, the issue is proof or retraction. I shall expect to meet that issue.

—"Champ Clark."

Among those present at the conference were Chairman Ollie M. James of Kentucky, former Governor David R. Francis of Missouri, Clark's floor leader at the convention; Senator Stone of Missouri, William H. Hearst, John Temple Graves, Representative Scott Ferris of Oklahoma, Delegate McGuire of California and Senator Reed of Missouri, who nominated the speaker.

Baltimore, [illegible] — Bristling with Democratic Progressivism, the platform on which the Democratic party will stand during the approaching campaign was completed by the committee on resolutions and awaits only the approval of the presidential nominee to be presented to the convention.

The document is the result of 48 hours of deliberation on the part of the committee.

From the first to last the committee's deliberations were characterized by harmony. The unanimous demand was for the most pronounced declarations in favor of Progressive policies all along the line and the only difference of opinion arose over the best methods of expressing them. The result is a platform of generally advanced views, although many of them are less radical than the party declarations of other years.

The document covers subjects of importance which has been the subject of party discussion during the last four years. None of them are elaborately presented, but the large number of subjects renders it voluminous.

Clark, at Baltimore, Attacks Bryan.

Speaker Goes to Baltimore and Demands Retraction of Tammany Charge.

Members of the committee express general satisfaction with the outcome of their vote, and Mr. Bryan, who took a most active part in framing the paper, made the prediction that it would arouse the disapproval of not to exceed a dozen members of the convention.

Under the new rule adopted, the platform will not be presented to the convention until after the nomination of the candidates.

Its submission will follow the selection of a vice presidential candidate.

Some of its salient points are:

Favors immediate downward revision of present duties, especially upon necessities of life. Also favors gradual reduction so as not to interfere with or destroy legitimate industries. Denounces President Taft for vetoing tariff bill of last congress.

Takes issue with the Republican platform as to the high cost of living, contending it is largely due to high tariff laws.

Favors vigorous enforcement of the criminal features of the anti-trust law. Demands such additional legislation as may be necessary to crush private monopoly. Favors prohibition of holding companies, interlocking directors, stock watering, etc.

Denounces as "usurpation" the efforts of Republicans to deprive states of their rights and to enlarge powers of the federal government.

"There is," says the platform, "no twilight seen between the nation and the state in which exploiting interests can take refuge from both."

Urges support of proposed constitutional amendments pending in various states' legislatures, providing for an income tax and election of United States senators by direct vote of the people. As justification of the demands of the party for publicity of campaign expenditures attention is directed "to the enormous expenditures of money in behalf of the president and predecessor in the recent presidential contest."

Declares for presidential preference primaries. Directs national committee to provide for election at primaries of members of national committee.

Pledges party to enactment of law prohibiting campaign contributions by corporations and unreasonable campaign contributions by individuals.

Favors single presidential term and making president ineligible to re-election.

Favors efficient supervision and rate regulation of railroads, express companies, telegraph and telephone lines and a valuation of these companies by the interstate commerce commission, and also legislation against overissuance of stocks of these corporations.

In connection with a demand for such a revision of the banking laws as will give temporary relief in case of financial distress, there is a denunciation of the Aldrich bill prepared by the monetary commission. The present method of depositing government funds is condemned, and the party is pledged to the enactment of a law for the deposit of such funds by competitive bidding in state or national banks without discrimination as to locality.

Pledges party to enactment of legislation to prevent devastation of lower Mississippi valley by floods and the control of the Mississippi is declared to be a national rather than a state problem. The maintenance of a navigable channel is also recommended.

Favors national aid regarding post roads.

Favors encouragment of agriculture and legislation to suppress gambling in agricultural products.

Believes in fostering growth of a merchant marine and urges speedy enactment of laws for greater security of life and property at sea.

Favors reorganization of the civil service and says laws should be honestly and rigidly enforced.

Demands for Alaska full enjoyment of rights and privileges of territorial American citizenship at home and abroad."

Renews declaration of last platform regarding generous pension policy.

The conclusion of the platform says: "Our platform is out of principles which we believe to be essential to our national welfare," and invites cooperation of "all citizens who believe in maintaining unimpaired the institutions and traditions of our country."

REGINA SWEPT BY CYCLONE

Half the Town Demolished--Between 400 and 500 Inhabitants Killed.

Regina, Saskatchewan.—Between 400 and 500 persons are believed to be dead, scores of others injured, and millions of dollars in property destroyed as a result of a cyclone which struck this city, cutting a wide swath, beginning at the southern and central residential sections and extending into the very heart of the business district, converting whole blocks into masses of tangled wreckage.

At the present time no complete estimate can be made of the actual number of deaths but every ambulance in the city has been working since six o'clock carrying the bodies to the hospitals which were filled to their utmost capacity early in the evening. Numbers of improvised hospitals were hastily constructed in some of the larger buildings left standing after the storm had passed.

Crowds of volunteers all over the city are assisting in the work of searching the wreckage and for hours hardly a minute went by that a dead body or the mangled form of some living victim was not uncovered. Hurrying men and women, speeding on their errands of mercy filled the streets as the night wore on, while the authorities strove to bring order out of confusion, succoring the living and to determine as best they could as to the identity and number of dead. The sweep of the storm, the worst in the history of the Canadian Northwest, was over a city which only a short time before had completed the work of decking itself in gala attire for the celebration of Dominion day. Bunting and flags covered the buildings everywhere and networks of colored electric lights were strung and ready for illumination. Through these gaily decorated streets the tornado swept and within a half-hour, Regina had been turned into a city of mourning. In the track of the storm, building after building lay in ruin, shrouded in its gay colored bunting.

Everywhere are men and women with heads and hands swathed in bandages, but all thinking of others' troubles, forgetful of their own.

It was 5 o'clock in the afternoon when the cyclone struck the city and in the history of the West, no such storm has ever been known.

Coming from the south, it dropped just a few blocks north of the southern city limits.

The former went with a crash that hardly sounded above the howling of the storm and the roar of the cloudburst that accompanied the wind.

The greater part of the roof was removed from the latter structure and the storm moved on across Victoria square, removing the walls and roof from the Y. W. C. A., badly wrecking the magnificent new public library, both new this year; and passing thence to the Presbyterian church, which fared but little better than the Methodist structure.

The Y. M. C. A. was next in line, and half of the building was demolished in an instant. Three small buildings were moved from their location, some being carried across the street, and the Masonic Temple was next attacked and was almost razed.

In the next block to the west and one block farther north, the telephone exchange stood practically by itself except for a few smaller buildings.

Upon this the force of the storm had an instantaneous effect, laying the building a flat mess of wreckage, under which the girls were imprisoned for over an hour.

Up until late in the evening absolutely no attempt was made to estimate the loss of property. The work of life saving will probably be continued all day today.

Except where it is necessary for the rescue of bodies, the ruins was left lying where they fell.

One of the best of the effects of the storm can be had from Lorne street, looking south. Hardly a residence is left standing on this street. Facing on Victoria square are the Methodist, Baptist, and Presbyterian churches, all of which are ruined and the Y. W. C. A., the new public library, and several smaller buildings are practically destroyed.

The C. P. R. railway yards are a flat expanse of ruined shops and trains. Hardly a car remains whole. Several were picked up bodily, and carried distances in the air and one was hurled through the freight sheds.

The whole north side of the city is practically wiped out.

No one knows how many are dead on this side of the city.

A canoe was carried from Wascana lake, a distance of three quarters of a mile, to Victoria park, and dropped there. Others, together with Dingbies and even small sailing vessels, lie strewn over the southern section of the city at distances varying up to half a mile from the lake.

The cupola of the Baptist church was dropped in the middle of a street three blocks away.

The electricians have been wandering through the devasted section cutting live wires. Power came on about 9 o'clock, after being off since the storm.

Husbands are hunting for wives, mothers for their children, men stop from time to time in their work of rescue to ask acquaintances passing for news of friends and relatives.

Many families were separated at the time of the storm, as the day was a hot one, and some sought comfort in the parks, while others remained at home.

Numbers were out on the waters of Wascana lake. Five are known to be drowned, failing to reach the shores in time. Every house in the city that is standing has been thrown open to the homeless.

One of the large grain elevators was picked up and thrown a distance of 51 feet from its foundation, falling on a freight train of goods and cattle cars.

One house barely on the edge of the storm was picked off its foundation and settled squarely on the vacated site.

NEW AVIATION FEATS.

Vessel Held Up.

New Orleans, La. — The steamship Antilles of the Southern Pacific Steamship company, bound for New York with between 150 and 175 passengers aboard, was held up in the Mississippi river off Jackson Barracks by the strike of firemen, coal passers, tenders and oilers. The Paris Mina of the United Fruit company was also held up in the river by a strike movement.

Laughing Leslie

By Izola Forrester

(Copyright, 1912, by Associated Literary Press.)

It was the last act of "Faust." Grace leaned forward to whisper in her sister's ear. Marguerite was singing her last impassioned aria, and Leslie's eyes filled with tears as she turned her head in quick response.

"Listen, dear. Jack and I are going on to a little dinner with the Boyds. It's awfully important for Jack to keep in touch with them just now. You won't mind, will you? You're to go home in the Carringtons' car. Don't forget. Mrs. Carrington is that tall, dark woman four boxes to the right."

"I don't mind a bit," Leslie said softly.

Yet when it was over, and the curtain fell, it startled her to find herself alone in the box. Grace had said she was to go with the Carringtons. Leslie hesitated. Standing, and drawing over her shoulders her long white velvet cloak, she glanced at the party in the Carrington box. The two Layton girls were there, and Dudley Paine. She didn't like the crowd, and frowned. There was Mrs. Kinlake, too. Even Grace frowned on Mrs. Kinlake. Then her gaze strayed to the next box, and rested there in pleased surprise. She bowed and smiled, the color stealing higher in her face.

It was so good to see a familiar face way up north here in New York. He was coming to her. Leslie bit her under lip, and looked down at her glove fastening.

"I've been hunting you for three days, Carter greeted her. He gripped her hand until she could have cried out with pain. "Why didn't you let me know they had sent you north—dearest?"

"But why should I?" she faltered. He was always so impulsive and imprudent. She wondered what Grace would say.

"Why? Because you knew it meant everything to me, and they were only trying to take you away from me. Dick told me so."

"Dick?" That was extremely like Dick, to upset all rules of the family game when he believed her happiness to be at stake, and Carter was running favorite in the race with Dick as a future brother-in-law.

"Yes. He rode over after you left and told me. I caught the night train from Washington and telephoned in the morning to the hotel, but they told me you were sailing for Italy."

"Grace's maid told you, I reckon," laughed Leslie, softly, with a fleeting upward glance at him. "We're not sailing until Saturday."

"You are not sailing at all," he retorted, then in low pleading just over her shoulder, as she started up the steps from the box. "Are you, Leslie? Tell me, dear, you're not going abroad, not now, are you?"

Suddenly Leslie saw that the Carrington box was vacant.

"Oh, I'm to go in the Carrington car home, Grace said," she exclaimed. "Will you take me down to it, please?"

"Don't go with them," Carter begged, hotly. "It's my one chance of seeing you alone. Let me take you home. What's the difference of trotting around New York under my wing minus a chaperon now, and riding 20 miles together through the mountains in the Cumberland?"

Leslie was silent. Her reason told her not to go, that Grace would object, that her mother would object, and yet every natural instinct urged her forward.

At the foot of the broad staircase he whispered:

"Leslie, won't you? It's my only chance. Be generous, dear. Grace flatly refused to let me call."

"I wonder why?"

"Because I'm not wealthy. I'm just Carter Fairfax. Since she married, and came up there to live, Grace would do anything for position. Why do you suppose they sent you here?"

"To—to give me a happy time, I thought." Leslie's eyes were full of tears. The lights before the opera house were all a blur. She was glad to creep into the shelter of a taxicab, and hide those traitor tears, even from his sight. Why should he scold her so? It seemed as if everybody scolded her nowadays.

"Give you a happy time," he repeated, through his set teeth. "Marry you off to the man with the best map of his present holdings. Dick said he heard his mother say she hoped Grace would succeed in launching you. Why, sweetheart, your father, the blessed old colonel, would kick the top off his casket this minute if he knew about this."

"They mean well, Carter," Leslie said slowly. "We're awfully poor. You know that."

"But, Lord Harry, so are we, dear. What does that matter? Haven't we got the dear old ruins that stand for home, and all the splendid acres that we love every foot of. Can't we raise enough to eat at our own tables, and feed the guest who honors us by staying under the rooftree? I rather guess we can. Wouldn't you rather marry me, and come to be mistress at White Chimneys, and see me go to the legislature as my father and grandfather did, and come back with the same sort of a name I took there? Wouldn't you, Leslie?"

The taxi had slipped across town to Madison avenue and up toward the park. It looked dewy and mysterious and alluring. Leslie could have blessed the chauffeur when he turned into its shadowy roads after a long silence. Someway, several things had happened during that silence. Carter had taken her in his arms, white velvet cloak and all, and had tried to kiss her. But she was a shy sweetheart, and very evasive when it came to facing the real issue. She hid her head resolutely on his shoulder, and merely said, very forcefully: "Carter!" Carter ceased striving and was silent, thankful that she even permitted his arm about her.

Then the taxi suddenly appeared to stand on its hind legs. At least that was Carter's description of it later. It rammed into something, reared and toppled over on the grass sward.

"Don't you dare give my name," Leslie whispered as she found herself safe and being lifted out in Carter's arms. The other car was hardly damaged. So was the other chauffeur. It was an empty car, speeding south. Carter was very busy explaining things to the mounted policeman while his chauffeur righted the taxi.

"Whatever did you tell him?" asked Leslie, as he rejoined her, and they walked slowly over to the east entrance.

"I told him anything to keep from being taken down to the night court with you, dear," he told her. "I had to protect you, you know. It said my wife and I were here from Virginia, and leaving in the morning. I hoped we would not be detained as witnesses. He said he would hold the chauffeur."

"Your wife?" repeated Leslie slowly. "How queer that sounds, Carter! What if it were true? What if it were all over and settled? I wonder what Grace and mother would say."

"What could they say, except that you had dared to choose your own husband. There's a cab. Shall I hail it?"

"I would rather walk. The park's the only natural thing I've seen so far. I love it tonight. Go on talking."

"Will you marry me tonight, Leslie?" His arm was around her again. They were in the heavy shadows of the trees. Leslie lifted her face until her lips brushed his chin.

"Not tonight, dear. Tomorrow. And then we'll go back home, where we belong. We're not even make believe New Yorkers, Carter. We're pathfinders on a new road to happiness."

Youthful Indiana Financier.

Ralph James is only fourteen years old, but already he has his own ideas regarding finance and how to obtain the greatest amount of money with the least exertion.

Rain fell in torrents here recently, choking the sewer and making a lake of the public square. The town was crowded with farmers whose horses were hitched at the rack in the square. When the time came to go home the farmers found they would have to wade through water knee deep to reach their horses. Then it was that young James arrived. He would unhitch the horses and drive them to dry land at a charge of only 25 cents for each horse, a modest request, but the farmers balked.

Some suggested a dime, while others thought 15 cents would be about right. "Two bits or nothing," said James. "I have the monopoly on this job; pay me my price or get your own horses." The farmers paid, and James has sufficient money to buy a new suit of clothes if he happens to want one.—Indianapolis News.

UNIVERSITY ENDS FIRST JOURNEY

SIX TRAVELING COLLEGES UNDER PRESIDENT VINCENT, VISITS 18 TOWNS.

WORK FIRST OF KIND.

Such an Experiment Never Before Tried in America—Pronounced a Distinct Success.

Minneapolis. — Six "traveling colleges" that have been open in six different places in Minnesota each week for three weeks past, until eighteen towns have been visited, have packed up their books and papers. Nearly a hundred people identified with the work have returned to Minneapolis from Cloquet, Grand Rapids, Coleraine, Bemidji, Crookston and Brainerd. Dr. George E. Vincent, president of the university, head of the traveling colleges, was in Crookston and remained there until the close.

Not only did the university bring to a successful close the first experiment of the kind in the country of carrying the work of the university out to the people, but from three weeks' experience in the field, in which eighteen towns were visited, each for a stay of a week, it has been found that:

The lecture habit brought people to the courses. Where Chautauqua talks are given annually, there was greatest interest displayed.

The experiment has shown that the university can extend its influence in an important manner through extension work.

Valuable information pertaining to educational work will be available when the full reports are in and analyzed.

The experiment of taking the university out to the people was very successful in the southern part of the state. Samuel Quigley, in charge of the work, said that he believes the northern Minnesota work will also be found to have been a success, but that he will be unable to tell much about it before the middle of next week.

"The week of June 3, which brought the extension work to Fairmont, Jackson, Worthington, Luverne, Windom and St. James, was a great success from standpoint of attendance and interest shown," Mr. Quigley said. "The week that began June 10, and included Waseca, Owatonna, Rochester, Plainview, Grand Meadow and Red Wing, was also a big success. It is too early yet to estimate the effect of the work in northern Minnesota, that began June 17 and has just ended, but the reports, notably one from Crookston, indicate that there has also been very successful work in that part of the field."

President Vincent has been running in and out of Minneapolis since the work began, spending an hour or two sometimes with his family, and then getting away again into the field. Thursday night again into the iron range, Friday found him in Brainerd, and he was in Crookston for the end of the three-week course.

Two important and valuable facts have developed, Mr. Quigley said yesterday, that the university can successfully carry on extension work of a teaching nature in the summer and can take a college out to the people; that the effect of the Chautauqua habit has been demonstrated.

"It is to the Chautauqua courses that have been going over the southern part of the state that the success of the work down there is perhaps attributable in an important degree," Mr. Quigley said, "While the idea of the University of Minnesota taking members of its staff and other institutions and its books and materials and going out to teach the people was entirely new, and the experiment was the first of the kind made by any great university, the habit of going to a lecture has been developed in southern Minnesota more than in other parts of the state. The people there took to it very quickly."

One hundred persons identified with the university, including many from the college of the agriculture, have participated in the work.

Question boxes for farmers were a feature of interest. The state normal schools, state library commission, federated women's clubs and University Dramatic and Glee clubs helped.

"When Dr. Vincent gets back, full reports in and it is possible to analyze them, I believe that we will have some of the most valuable material ever gotten together to show what a university may do in extending its influence and the benefit of its work," said Mr. Quigley.

WORLD GROWING BETTER

President of Lombard University Speaks Before Universalists.

Owatonna.—"This world is growing better, not worse, despite the pessimistic croaks of those who would have us believe this is an age of degeneration," said Dr. Lewis B. Fisher, president of Lombard university, speaking before the Universalist state convention.

"Those who continually discover the bad things and bad people of this world are those who are looking for the worst in life," he continued. "The honest good men and women outnumber the unprincipled ten to one, and this is a mighty good world when we make it so."

Dr. Fisher's address was delivered before a church filled with people, all of whom applauded his utterances. Dr. Marion D. Shutter spoke briefly.

The Sunday school convention decided to begin a campaign in this country and appointed a committee to head this work. James Buchenan of St. Paul and Mrs. Percy Lord of Minneapolis took prominent parts. Reports were read on the condition of the churches at Stillwater, Rochester, Anoka, Austin and Fergus Falls. An appeal was made for aid of substantial sort for All Souls' church, Minneapolis, which is said to be experiencing reversals.

The Woman's association served a breakfast at the church, which was attended by about 200 people. The speakers were Dr. Shutter, Mrs. Shutter, Dr. L. B. Fisher, Rev. Mr. Gibbs and Rev. J. M. Darnell.

DUMAS TO GET A STAY.

Court Will Have Him Appear at the September Term.

Grand Rapids.—Over the vigorous protests of the state, Dr. Dumas will procure a stay of sentence in the arson case tried in Beltrami county. The matter was before Judge McClenahan in district court in Bagley Saturday afternoon on an order to show cause obtained by Attorney George Spear, in behalf of the former mayor of Cass Lake, and was heard upon affidavits submitted both by prosecution and defense.

The state claimed that no additional time should be allowed the defendant, as any questions which might arise on a motion for a new trial could have been presented on the arguments had in the Supreme Court May last. But the court ruled that the defendant was within his rights in the course proposed to be taken.

Judge McClenahan announced he would sign an order which would require the defendant to appear upon the opening date of the Beltrami county term next September for sentence, or such further order as the court might make; and that he would hear the motion for the new trial if made during the interim.

FUGITIVE IN CANADA.

Left His Hat on Duluth Pier to Indicate Suicide by Drowning.

Duluth.—O. W. Berchtold, whose hat was found on the North canal pier June 10, is by his own word a fugitive from justice and is now in Canada. The final chapter of the hat mystery was furnished when Chief of Police Troyer of Duluth received definite information from Danville, Ill., that Berchtold is wanted there on a charge of embezzlement from a cream company.

Chief Troyer said that Berchtold was under bond at Danville and left for Duluth. Arriving here Berchtold wrote back to Illinois, "I suppose the sheriff is on my trail by now, but it is no use as I am going to Canada and you cannot find me. There is nothing in my trunk but some foolish letters and these I pray you burn."

The hat evidently was left on the pier to lead the authorities to believe the man had committed suicide.

STEWART IN A CRASH.

Candidate for President Hurt When Auto Turns Turtle.

Owatonna.—Oliver P. Stewart, Prohibition candidate for president, figured in an automobile accident here.

Stewart had spoken here and was on his way to Faribault, when, three miles north of Owatonna, the machine turned turtle, pinning Stewart and the other members of the party beneath the automobile. A party of autoists from Faribault and G. G. Carliff witnessed the accident and rescued the prohibitionists from their plight. Stewart was bruised and injured, but the other members of the party escaped without injury.

A peculiar coincidence was the fact that Anna Long, whose brother was injured the same day in another automobile accident, was a member of the party. The machine lights were broken and the front damaged. All were brought to this city, where medical attention was given them.

St. Paul. — St. Paul's name is is officially before the committee of the new Progressive party as the meeting place of its first national convention. The probability of the convention going to St. Paul is good, according to Progressive leaders. Hugh T. Halbert, on behalf of the Progressives of Minnesota and the Northwest, and John H. Colonel Roosevelt's fight in Minnesota was given a set-back when J. F. Jacobson, who had been sloted to head the Roosevelt forces refused to take any active part as leader of a third party movement. Minneapolis Steam Laundry Burns—Loss $50,000.

Minneapolis. — A fire, starting from unknown origin in the Minneapolis steam laundry, caused a damage estimated at $50,000 and routed out the guests of four hotels.

DREADED ATAXIA

Mr. Francis M. Poole, a harness maker, of Garvin, Lyon Co., Minn., says: "My illness started in 1902, with sharp pains all through my limbs. At first I thought it was rheumatism but the pains kept getting more and more severe and I grew steadily worse. Later a numbness came over my feet. It gradually extended up my legs to my spine and waist. By this time I had lost all control of my legs. Next my bladder and bowels were affected and I lost all control of them. At this stage of the disease I was perfectly helpless and from November, 1905, to April, 1906, I was confined to the bed. My memory was so affected that I thought I would lose my mind. I looked just like a dead person. My lips and finger nails were blue. I suffered with terrible sharp, shooting pains and could get relief only from the use of morphine.

"I was treated by five St. Paul doctors. All of them pronounced my case locomotor ataxia. One said I could not live a year and another told my wife all he could do for me was to give medicine to relieve the pain. I was discouraged and, when my brother-in-law urged me to try Dr. Williams' Pink Pills for Pale People, I did so willingly for he had read of their curing a case similar to mine. I started to take the pills in March, 1906, while I was still confined to bed. I took several boxes when I felt a slight change for the better and had a healthier look. I was finally able to go to the country but kept on with the treatment. The bluish color left my lips and my eyes became brighter. I took the pills a long time and the next spring in May I could walk around. In June I went to work although still weak. I kept on gaining and am now working without the return of a symptom of my former trouble and without losing a days' work. Dr. Williams' Pink Pills for Pale People absolutely cured me and I want all fellow sufferers to know of my wonderful recovery."

Those who are interested in the treatment which cured this case should have our booklet, "Diseases of the Nervous System," which will be sent to every nervous sufferer upon request.

Dr. Williams' Pink Pills are sold by all druggists, or sent, postpaid, on receipt of price, 50 cents per box; six boxes for $2.50 by the Dr. Williams Medicine Co., Schenectady, N. Y.

Wichita lawyers are yet talking about the way Wallace B. Baker, who was found guilty recently in the district court of selling mortgaged property, showed his ignorance of married life. The prosecuting attorney was trying to show that Baker wasn't married. He asked Baker the following questions:

"Did you ever send your wife any dresses?"

"Yes, I sent her four dresses."

"What kind of dresses did you send her?"

"How much did you pay for the good dress, Mr. Baker?"

The lawyer put Mr. Baker down then and there as an unmarried man and a poor guesser.—Exchange.

DUBIOUS

About What Her Husband Would Say.

A Mich. woman tried Postum because coffee disagreed with her and her husband. Tea is just as harmful as coffee because it contains caffeine—the same drug found in coffee. She writes:

"My husband was sick for three years with catarrh of the bladder, and palpitation of the heart, caused by coffee. Was unable to work at all and in bed part of the time.

"I had stomach trouble, was weak and fretful so I could not attend to my housework—both of us using coffee all the time and not realizing it was harmful.

"One morning the grocer's wife said she believed coffee was the cause of our trouble and advised Postum. I took it home rather dubious what my husband would say—he was fond of coffee.

"But I took coffee right off the table and we haven't used a cup of it since. You should have seen the change in us, and now my husband never complains of heart palpitation any more. My stomach trouble went away in two weeks after I began Postum. My children love it, and it does them good, which can't be said of coffee.

"A lady visited us who was usually half sick. I told her I'd make her a cup of Postum. She said it was tasteless stuff, but she watched me make it, boiling it thoroughly for 15 minutes, and when done, she said it was splendid. Long boiling brings out the flavor and food quality." THE RATS GO ASHORE.

Following the nomination of President Taft at Chicago, the following statement was issued by Sam Y. Gordor, Republican candidate for Governor of Minnesota:

"The nomination of President Taft at Chicago, under the circumstances, means that he and the reactionaries who forced his nomination by fraudulent means will all go down in a heap at the November election. If newspaper accounts of the Chicago Convention are true, and I believe they are, I cannot see that any self-respecting Republican is in any manner bound by the arbitrary and high-handed action of the National Committee which has thwarted the will of the people by refusing seats to fairly elected delegates and by forcing upon the party a candidate for the presidency who has been repudiated by the Republicans of the country in the primaries. If the President gives his approval to the outrages there permitted, he has forfeited the right to ask the support of all progressive Republicans, It is another case of bossism defying the people. Should I be successful in securing the nomination as a candidate fot governor of ,this state, I now give notice that Iwill not consider it incumbent upon me to give aid or endorsement in any way to the reelection of President Taft, whose nomination I believe has been secured through political trickery and high-handed fraud."

Mr. Gordon has taken the only course he could under the circumstances, if the people did not rebuke a transaction of that kind at the ballot box, this nation would sink into oblivion, but they will put old Taft out of business in November. Of course it will be tough on that Engineers office at St. Paul to loose their fat job of representing the lumber companys but they can get a job of grubbing up this way. Rats always desert a sinking ship and Gordon has shown that he has as much sense as a rat, for any candidate for any official position that indorses Taft will sink with his ship next November so far from shore that they will never be heard of by wireless telegraph.

It is pretty tough on the Republican Candidates for office to have a man at the head of the national ticket that they dare not own, but any official, from Congress man and U.S.Senator down to pound master,that indorses Taft off goes his head, for the people are aroused to the fact,that there must be a house cleaning and they will don good job of it in November.

The lumber companys have again closed off the outlet to Red Lake with log jams. It is to bad that they could not get a government dam put in there and have it under the supervision of Major Shunk so they would not have to put in a log jam to shut off the water. But Shunk and men of his ilk will be hunting another job after old Taft goes over the dump.

Real Angel of Death.

Most of us are familiar with the beautiful and artistic conception of French wherein a young sculptor who is plying his magic chisel upon a block of stone and summoning from the snowy depths of the marble the dream face of his soul's ideal is gently touched by the wistful eyed angel of death and the skillful arm forever stayed. The whole creation is marvelously beautiful, and the world is better for its birth. Nevertheless it is allegorical and misleading. The real angel of death in the case of the thin faced sculptor was not a sad visaged maiden of classical profile. In all probability it was a minute, rodlike organism floating amid motes of dust and known to scientists as the "bacillus tuberculosis." The writer does not want to be a shatterer of ideals, but the sooner such poetic notions of death are done away with and the mass of the people educated in a common sense way to the dangers of dust and bacteria the better it will be for humanity in general.—J. G. Ogden in Popular Mechanics.

Chinese Criminal Law.

Curiously like the Mosaic and Roman customs, the fixed laws of China are carved in stone and set up in the streets. Chinese criminal law, which is founded on the "Chau Kung," or ritual of Chan, is based upon the accused confessing, and no punishment can ensue until this is brought about. Before the condemned are decapitated they are offered all the samshu they desire to drink, and in most cases they are allowed to choose whether they will ride in a ricksha or be carried in a sedan.—J. The Claws of Mooneye

By Jane Gahan

Piebald Pete found out he owned an internal agitator the night Minnie Mooneye shot Yellow Puffs through her wrist.

He stood at one side of the ring, watching the two go through their act. Four oil torches flared in the darkness of the tent. The faces on the benches were blurred and motionless. For the instant the whole place was held in a spell of silence, waiting for the Indian girl to do her famous trick. She was shooting with a revolver, backward over one shoulder, at a card held by Yellow Puffs, taking aim from a hand mirror.

The girl did not shriek when the bullet struck her wrist. She looked at the face of the other and smiled, white lipped.

The band started to play at a warning from Pete's megaphone. Then he made for the side tent while they hustled on another act to cover the accident.

"I'm sorry, girl," he gasped, huskily, bending over the shattered wrist. "The cat! She's never missed that shot."

Mooneye stood near, watching them with unblinking eyes, brown and soft as sealskin.

"It's all right. Maybe she didn't mean to. Get a doctor, will you, Pete. I need that wrist."

She drew it back quickly. Pete had stooped and kissed her arm.

"Say, you ain't got any heart at all, have you?" he demanded.

Puffs looked at the figure of the Indian girl just visible in the tent entrance.

"You're ringing the wrong bell, Pete," she said slowly. "Why don't you take notice of that little Indian kid yonder?"

"Who? Mooneye? Why?"

"Don't you know?" She smiled up in his face. "I do."

Pete was silent, but bewildered. Therefore he swore vaguely to himself, and went back to the ring after seeing the girl cared for.

"Don't, Mooneye's Watching You."

He didn't know what she meant. He had never noticed Mooneye specially until that night. But then, Puffs had also escaped notice. Standing back at the side of the ring, with his megaphone held in readiness to announce the acts, Piebald Pete faced his destiny, and knew he was in love with Puffs.

When anyone became a working member of Piebald Pete's show, he received a new name just as if it were a New Jerusalem citizenship. It was a token of comradely interest, a professional accolade.

Minnie Mooneye had been named the first day a bunch of real Indians straggled into the half-built camp. She was the last in the procession. They were not fresh from the far west, these red brothers and sisters. For years they had upheld the pathetic and thrilling traditions of a vanishing race, according to the barkers, in little one-ring western shows. They danced, fought, whooped, howled and kept the passing race from becoming extinct.

Mooneye was a half-breed. She carried a couple of suit cases, and walked lightly in her heeled boots. She was a delicate saffron tint, with dusky, slumbrous eyes, wide, childlike, with a tantalizing uplift at the corners. Her dark hair was bound about her head in close braids. As she passed, a lanky, staring cowboy threw out the name to her.

"Hello there, Mooneye. Step high! So with Yellow Puffs. To be exact, she was a [illegible] cowboy. That was [illegible]

Mooneye was made to see that she had committed a social error.

"Trouble is with an Injun girl, she thinks she can buy a husband with collateral, so to speak," one of the boys remarked. "Mooneye's after Petey, and she'll either get him or somebody's scalp."

Pete stood beside Yellow Puffs. He loved her hair even. It was short and thick, and very curly, and "real for sure yellow," he told himself. A thrill ran through him when she leaned back against his shoulder to let the old stage coach rumble into the ring. He welcomed the thrill. It was the precursor of adventure.

"Say, girl, you wait till the season closes, and I've got a wad," he said quietly. "You needn't stare. I mean it. I've wanted you ever since you first joined the show, and I play white. Does your wrist hurt you?"

Puffs had put it behind her, and laughed shortly. They stood in the shadow of the big canvas entrance. Beyond were the small tents, out in the darkness. The nearest one was Mooneye's. Pete's pulses began to tap dance music, the same old tune that Pan taught Childe Cupid to hop to, some time back. He bent over and kissed the girl's cheek. She swerved so he could not reach her lips.

"Don't. Mooneye's watching you," she said curtly. "I don't trespass on anybody else's brand."

"There's no brand on me," sent back Pete, hotly; then he, too, turned and saw the Indian standing motionless near, and he ceased thrilling. There was the touch of claws on his neck.

"Look at her eyes, Pete," said Puffs. "They give you away."

Pete hesitated, helpless, blundering, dogged, between the two of them; then he went into the ring.

Puffs waited for her turn. The pony she always rode was dancing restlessly under check. In the ring Pete was doing his star act, as Piebald Pete from Windy Valley, dead shot scout and terror of the redskins. Now they had turned the steers and buffaloes into the ring for the grand roundup and fight. After that came Puffs' riding turn.

Suddenly the Indian disappeared. There came the last volley of shot and the thud of hoofs as the boys chased the steers. Puffs backed her pony to let them pass through the narrow passage, but as the first head appeared Mooneye rose from the shadows, waving a lighted torch under its nostrils.

The rearing, dancing pony was in the way. Puffs tried to hold it steady as the frightened steer lowered its head and backed into the mass behind him. Mooneye had tossed the torch madly at their jammed heads, and was yelling something. The foremost steers tried to turn and were trampled by those behind. A roar rose from the seats at the smell of smoke.

"Get back there," Puffs shouted to the Indian. "You'll be killed."

She pressed the sides of the pony lightly, and it sprang forward, shoulder against the flank of the steer.

"Come on, boys; chase them now!" she called back, and the mass broke as the leader ran headlong, Puffs at his heels.

"Is Mooneye hurt?" was her first question, after the danger was past and Pete found her.

"Is she hurt?" he repeated grimly. "I should say not. You'd have been gored and trampled if she'd had her way. She leaves tomorrow."

Puffs looked up at his eyes.

"Why? Let me go. She's more to the show than I am."

"But she ain't more to me. Oh, I mean it." reached for her hungrily. "I've let you go along easy, girl, and almost lost you, letting you have your own way. You sure had me eating out of your hand tamely, didn't you? Here I go along on tiptoes, respecting you ladies, and getting clawed right and left. It ends right here tonight, Puffs. Mooneye's packing her army blanket this minute. We'll get married tomorrow, and maybe skip the show business; what do you say? I can get a foreman's position anywhere west of Joplin, and you won't have to lope around any sawdust ring. Like it, girl, dear?"

Puffs put her arms up around his neck. Out in the ring they were putting out the lights.

"I'll go, Pete," she whispered.

The Dean's Lesson.

Jonathan Swift, the Dean Swift so well known to fame, dearly loved a joke, and constantly inflicted them on his friends and servants. Sometimes they were kindly enough, and sometimes quite the reverse. In "Martha, Lady Giffard," Julia G. Longe gives an amusing example of the former kind.

Once when the dean was traveling in Ireland he found himself obliged to stay the night at a wayside inn. In the morning, when his servant brought him his boots, he saw that they had not been cleaned; he asked why.

"I thought, sir, as you were going to ride, that they would soon be dirty again."

"Oh!" said his master. "Very well; go and see to the horses." The man obeyed, and in the meantime the dean ordered the landlord not to give him any breakfast. When [illegible] the horses round.

"But, sir," remonstrated the man, "I have not yet had my breakfast."

"Oh, that is no matter," replied the dean cheerfully. "We will start on our journey, for it is certain that if [illegible] would soon be hungry again." And [illegible]

Lieut. Harry Mallory is ordered to the Philippines. He and Marjorie Newton decide to elope, but wreck of taxicab prevents their seeing minister on the way to the train. Transcontinental train is taking on passengers. Porter has a lively time with an Englishman and Ira Lathrop, a Yankee business man. The elopers have an exciting time getting to the train.

CHAPTER III. (Continued.)

Her nether lip trembled and her eyes were filmed, but they were brave, and her voice was so tender that it wooed his mind from his watch. He gazed at her, and found her so dear, so devoted and so pitifully exquisite, that he was almost overcome by an impulse to gather her into his arms there and then, indifferent to the immediate passengers or to his far-off military superiors. An hour ago they were young lovers in all the lilt and thrill of elopement. She had clung to him in the gloaming of their taxicab, as it sped like a genie at their whim to the place where the minister would unite their hands and raise his own in blessing. Thence the new husband would have carried the new wife away, his very own, soul and body, duty and beauty. Then, ah, then in their minds the future was an unwaning honeymoon, the journey across the continent, a stroll along a lover's lane, the Pacific ocean a garden lake, and the Philippines a chain of Fortunate Isles decreed especially for their Eden. And then the taxicab encountered a lamppost. They thought they had merely wrecked a motor car—and lo, they had wrecked a Paradise.

The railroad ceased to be a lover's lane and became a lingering torment; the ocean was a weltering Sahara, and the Philippines a Dry Tortugas of exile.

Mallory realized for the first time what heavy burdens he had taken on with his shoulder straps; what a dismal life of restrictions and hardships an officer's life is bound to be.

Perhaps young Mr. Montague and young Miss Capulet, instead of wailing, "No, that is not the lark whose notes do beat the vaulty heaven so high above our heads," would have done no better than Mr. Mallory and Miss Newton. In any case, the best these two could squeeze out was:

"It's just too bad, honey."

"But I guess it can't be helped, dear."

"It's a mean old world, isn't it?"

"Awful!"

And then they must pile out into the street again so lost in woe that they did not know how they were trampled or elbowed. Marjorie's despair was so complete that it paralyzed instinct. She forgot Snoozlenms! A thoughtful passenger ran out and tossed the basket into Mallory's arms even as the car moved off.

Fortune relented a moment and they found a taxicab waiting where they had expected to find it. Once more they were cosy in the flying twilight, but their grief was their only baggage, and the clasp of their hands talked all the talk there was.

Anxiety within anxiety tormented them and they feared another wreck. But as they swooped down upon the station, a kind-faced tower clock beamed the reassurance that they had three minutes to spare.

The taxicab drew up and halted, but they did not get out. They were kissing good-byes, fervidly and numerously, while a grinning station-porter winked at the winking chauffeur.

Marjorie simply could not have done with farewells.

"I'll go to the gate with you," she said.

He told the chauffeur to wait and take the young lady home. The lieutenant looked so honest and the girl so sad that the chauffeur simply touched his cap, though it was not his custom to allow strange fares to vanish into crowded stations, leaving behind nothing more negotiable than instructions to wait.

CHAPTER IV.

A Mouse and a Mountain.

All the while the foiled elopers were eloping, the San Francisco sleeper was filling up. It had been the receptacle of assorted lots of humanity tumbling into it from all directions, with all sorts of souls, bodies and destinations.

The porter received each with that expert eye of his. His car was his laboratory. A railroad journey is a sort of test-tube of character; strange elements meet under strange conditions and make strange combinations. The porter could never foresee the ingredients of any trip, nor their actions and reactions.

He had no [illegible] established Mr. Wedgewood of London and Mr. Ira Lathrop of Chicago in comparative repose, than his car was invaded by a woman who flung herself into the first seat. She was flushed with running and breathing hard, but she managed one gasp of relief:

"Thank goodness, I made it in time."

The mere sound of a woman's voice in the seat back of him was enough to disperse Ira Lathrop. With not so much as a glance backward to see what manner of woman it might be, he jammed his contract into his pocket, seized his newspapers and retreated to the farthest end of the car, bouncing down into berth number one, like a sullen snapping turtle.

Miss Anne Gattle's modest and homely valise had been brought aboard by a leisurely station usher, who set it down and waited with a speaking palm outstretched. She had her tickets in her hand, but transferred them to her teeth while she searched for money in a handbag old-fashioned enough to be called a reticule.

The usher closed his fist on the pittance she dropped into it and departed without comment. The porter advanced on her with a demand for "Tickets, please."

She began to ransack her reticule with flurried haste, taking out of it a small purse, opening that, closing it, putting it back, taking it out, searching the reticule through, turning out a handkerchief, a few hairpins, a few trunk keys, a baggage check, a bottle of salts, a card or two and numerous other maidenly articles, restoring them to place, looking in the purse again, restoring that, closing the reticule, setting it down, shaking out a book she carried, opening her old valise, going through certain white things hushingly, closing it again, shaking her skirts, and shaking her head in bewilderment.

She was about to open the reticule again, when the porter exclaimed:

"I see it! Don't look no mo'. I see it!"

When she cast up her eyes in despair, her hatbrim had been elevated enough to disclose the whereabouts of the tickets. With a murmured apology, he removed them from her teeth and held them under the light. After a time he said:

"As neah as I can make out from the—the undigested po'tion of this ticket, yo' numbe is six."

"That's it—six!"

"That's right up this way."

"Let me sit here till I get my breath," she pleaded. "I ran so hard to catch the train."

"Well, you caught it good and strong."

"I'm so glad. How soon do we start?"

"In about half a houah."

"Really? Well, better half an hour too soon than half a minute too late."

Mrs. Jimmie Wellington.

She said it with such a copy-book primness that the porter set her down as a school-teacher. It was not a bad guess. She was a missionary. With a pupil-like shyness she volunteered:

"Yo' berth is all ready whenever you wishes to go to baid." He caught her swift hiush and amended it to—"to retiah."

"Retire?—before all the car?" said Miss Anne Gattle, with prim timidity. "No, thank you! I intend to sit up till everybody else has retired."

The porter retired. [illegible] took out a bit of [illegible] fancy stitching and [illegible] another Dorcas. Her needle [illegible] dived in and emerged many times before she was holding [illegible] un of defense against a sudden human mountain that threatened to crush her.

A vague round face, huge and red as a rising moon, dawned before her eyes and from it came an uncertain voice:

"Esscuzhe me, mad'm, no [illegible] tended."

The words and the breath that carried them gave the startled spinster an instant proof that her vis-a-vis did not share her prohibition principles or practices. She regarded the elephant with mouse-like terror, and the elephant regarded the mouse with elephantine fright, then he removed himself from her landscape as quickly as he could and hitched along the aisle, calling out merrily to the porter:

[illegible] round these parts [illegible]. He collided with a [illegible] singing his nasal lay, but it was the behemoth and not the train-boy that collapsed into a seat, sprawling as helplessly as a mammoth oyster on a table-cloth.

The porter rushed to his aid and hoisted him to his feet with an uneasy sense of impending trouble. He felt as if someone had left a monstrous baby on his doorstep, but all he said was:

"Tickets, please."

There ensued a long search, fat, flabby hands flopping and fumbling from pocket to pocket. Once more the porter was the discoverer.

"I see it. Don't look no mo'. Here it is—up in yo' hatband." He lifted it out and chuckled. "Had it right next his brains and couldn't remember!" He took up the appropriately huge luggage of the bibulous wanderer and led him to the other end of the aisle.

"Numba two is yours, sah. Right heah—all nice and cosy, and already made up."

The big man looked through the curtains into the cabined confinement, and groaned:

"That! Haven't you got a man's size berth?"

"Sorry, sah. That's as big a bunk as they is on the train."

"Have I got to be locked up in that pigeon-hole for—for how many days is it to Reno?"

"Reno?" The porter greeted that meaningful name with a smile. "We're doo in Reno the—the—mawnin' of the fo'th day, sah. Yassah." He put the baggage down and started away, but the fat man seized his hand, with great emotion:

"Don't leave me all alone in there, porter, for I'm a broken-hearted man."

"Is that so? Too bad, sah."

"Were you ever a broken-hearted man, porter?"

"Always, sah."

"Did you ever put your trust in a false-hearted woman?"

"Often, sah."

"Was she ever true to you, porter?"

"Never, sah."

"Porter, we are partners in misels-ery."

And he wrung the rough, black hand with a solemnity that embarrassed the porter almost as much as it would have embarrassed the passenger himself if he could have understood what he was doing. The porter disengaged himself with a patient but hasty:

"I'm afraid you'll have to 'scuse me. I got to he'p the other passengers on bode."

"Don't let me keep you from your duty. Duty is the—the—" But he could not remember what duty was, and he would have dropped off to sleep, if he had not been startled by a familiar voice which the porter had luckily escaped.

"Pawtah! Pawtah! Can't you raise this light—or rather can't you lower it? Pawtah! This light is so infernally dim I can't read."

To the Englishman's intense amazement his call brought to him not the porter, but a rising moon with the profound query:

"Whess a li'l thing like dim light, when the light of your life has gone out?"

"I beg your pardon?"

Without further invitation, the mammoth descended on the Englishmen's territory.

"I'm a broken-hearted man, Mr.—Mr.—I didn't get your name."

"Er—ah—I dare say."

"Thanks, I will sit down." He lifted a great carry-all and airily tossed it into the aisle, set the Gladstone on the lap of the infuriated Englishman, and squeezed into the seat opposite, making a sad mix-up of knees.

"My name's Wellington. Ever hear of li'l Jimmie Wellington? That's me."

"Any relation to the Duke?"

"Nagh!"

He no longer interested Mr. Wedgewood. But Mr. Wellington was not aware that he was being snubbed. He went right on getting acquainted:

"Are you married, Mr.—Mr.—?"

"No!"

"My heartfelt congrashletions. Hang on to your luck, my boy. Don't let any female take it away from you." He slapped the Englishman on the elbow amiably, and his prisoner was too stifled with wrath to emit more than one feeble "Pawtah!"

Mr. Wellington mused on aloud: "Oh, if I had only remained single. But she was so beautiful and she swore to love, honor and obey. Mrs. Wellington is a queen among women, mind you, and I have nothing to say against her except that she has the temper of a tarantula." He italicized the word with a light fillip of his left hand along the back of the seat. He did not notice that he filliped the angry head of Mr. Ira Lathrop in the next seat. He went on with his portrait of his wife. "She has the extravaganza of a sultana"—another fillip for Mr. Lathrop—"the jealousy of a cobra, the flirtatiousness of a humming bird." Mr. Lathrop was glaring round like a man-eating tiger, but Wellington talked on. "She drinks, swears and smokes cigars, otherwise she's fine—a queen among women."

Neither this amazing vision of womankind, nor this beautiful example of longing for confession and sympathy awakened a response.

Then as Mr. Wellington shook with joy at the prospect of "Dear old Reno!" he began unconsciously to draw Ira Lathrop's head after his hand across the seat. The pain of it shot the tears into Lathrop's eyes, and as he writhed and twisted he was too full of profanity to get any one word out.

BREEDING THE SHIRE HORSE

Character, Symmetry, Style, Constitution, Soundness and Type of Mare Are of Importance.

The first thing a farmer must try to get is a mare or two of just the right sort to begin with. The age to buy is not of so much importance; by buying fillies at one or two years old, they have the full length of their breeding life before them, but at the same time there is the risk of their proving non-breeders, or inferior breeders, while by buying a mare that has bred a foal or two successfully we discount the risk, but have to pay a higher price, and lose as much of her life as has passed. The mare that has begun to breed is the safest speculation.

In selecting the brood-mare the character, symmetry, style, constitution, soundness and type are of even greater importance than pedigree. It is well to have a type of perfection in one's eye and to get as near that as possible.

The head and eyes should betoken docility, intelligence and courage. It is only by close observation that any one can acquire the art of recognizing character in a mare. No amount of descriptive writing can teach one how to judge these characteristics in horse or man. The loin, of course, should be strong, and the tail well set up, in line with the back, not drooping. In a brood-mare a strong, healthy constitution is of the utmost importance.

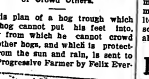
As for size, a mare standing 16 hands high, and built in proportion, is big enough. Color may be selected according to taste, but a brown or bay colored animal is always more salable than a black or any of the lighter colors.

When buying, every precaution should be taken to insure soundness—that is, absence of all hereditary disease, and a few dollars extra should not prevent a bargain being made if the mere approaches anywhere near the ideal above described.

SANITARY TROUGH FOR HOGS

One Constructed in Such Manner That Animal Cannot Get Its Feet in or Crowd Others.

This plan of a hog trough which the hog cannot put his feet into, away from which he cannot crowd the other hogs, and which is protected from the sun and rain, is sent to the Progressive Farmer by Felix Eversole of Tullahoma, Tenn. It can be made any size desired, and of such lumber as may be handy. If ends are made long, it cannot be turned over. Looks to us like a good idea.



Sanitary Hog Trough.

Raising Horses.

Men who are raising scrub horses and using grade sires of any breed are very foolish. Plug horses and those which fit nowhere may sell low in the future, but horses that have a trade will sell high. Any sound saddle horse or any light harness horse or big draft horse or coach horse, any good chunk, any stylish Southern horse, any express horse and, we might say, any cavalry horse, will sell well, while the unclassified horse will grade at the tail end and sell for the plug that he is.

Cure for Stumbling.

If a horse stumbles [illegible] his food on the floor, instead of in the manger. The position necessarily taken in feeding strengthens the muscles of the knees [illegible] the cause of the stumbling [illegible] just brought from [illegible] not stumble.

Pasture for Horses.

Have plenty of pasture for the brood mares and colts. If the mares work during the week, let them graze on Sundays. Pasture is a cheap feed for all classes of stock, but don't pasture too closely.

TREATING HORSE FOR WORMS

Three Excellent Remedies Given That Have Been Tried and Found Satisfactory.

This is one of the best worm destroyers for unthrifty colts and horses that we have ever tried. Mix together one pound each of sugar and salt; in this mix one-half pound of fine smoking tobacco, six ounces of powdered sulphate of iron. As a dose for a mature horse give a heaping tablespoonful in a wheat-bran mash every morning for two weeks. Colts should be given in smaller proportion to size and age.

A veterinary supply house advises the following remedy for worms in horses: Give a teaspoonful of powdered copper sulphate every morning in feed for three or four days, then give two ounces of turpentine in a plot of raw linseed oil. Feed soft feed and keep the infected animal in the stable while under treatment.

A veterinary physician, signing no name, suggests this treatment in an exchange: Clear the bowels by allowing the horse to fast over night, and give in the morning two ounces of turpentine in a pint of raw linseed oil or gruel, followed in the course of an hour with a bran mash; repeat this for two or three mornings. Santonin in half or one-ounce doses, made into powders, with linseed meal, may be given to valuable horses for two or three mornings in succession, followed by a cathartic.

ROOT-GRINDER IS EXCELLENT

Any Poultrymen or Stock Raiser Can Make Practical Implement at Very Little Expense.

(By J. G. ALLHOUSE, in the Farm and Fireside.)

An easier and speedier method of reducing beets, carrots, turnips and other roots to pulp than chopping up with a spade or the four-bladed chopper sometimes used for this purpose is provided by the cheap home-made grinder illustrated. Any poultryman or stock-raiser can make it at trifling expense of time and work and use it with belt wheel for steam or gas-engine power, or if desired or compulsory, a crank and fly-wheel may be attached and the grinder operated by hand-power. Manner of making hopper, attaching legs, braces, etc., is well explained in large illustration; small illustration shows sectionally the interior or main working parts. A triangular-shaped strip of wood (A) extends across rear side of box, firmly nailed in place behind the spiked cylinder (B), which revolves and does the grinding, and another wooden strip (C), fitted with teeth like the cylinder, extends across front side, and slides in grooves or small strips at ends of hopper as an adjustable concave. Teeth may be 12-penny spikes, heads cut off and the remainder driven into cylinder, leaving about a half-inch projecting, with ends filed sharp. The distance cylinder teeth are placed apart and position of movable concave, the teeth of which should intersect those of the cylinder, will determine the degree of fineness to which roots may be reduced. The grinder may be made of any desired capacity. If all its working parts are well made with screws and bolts, it will be very durable and may be run at high speed.

ALMOST FRANTIC WITH ITCHING ECZEMA

"Eight years ago I got eczema all over my hands. My fingers fairly bled and it itched until it almost drove me frantic. The eruption began with itching under the skin. It spread fast from between the fingers around the nails and all over the whole hands. I got a pair of rubber gloves in order to wash dishes. Then it spread all over the left side of my chest. A fine doctor treated the trouble two weeks, but did me no good. I cried night and day. Then I decided to try Cuticura Soap and Ointment but without much hope as I had gone so long. There was a marked change the second day, and so on until I was entirely cured. The Cuticura Soap we have always kept in our home, and we decided after that lesson that it is a cheap soap in price and the very best in quality. My husband will use no other soap in his shaving mug." (Signed) Mrs. G. A. Selby, Redonda Beach, Cal., Jan. 15, 1911. Although Cuticura Soap and Ointment are sold by druggists and dealers everywhere, a sample of each, with 32-page book, will be mailed free on application to "Cuticura," Dept. L, Boston.

SINGLE HANDED YACHTING

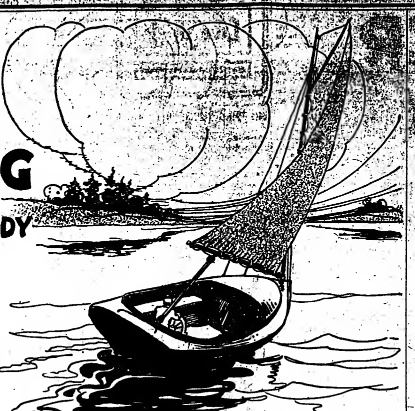
COPYRIGHT BY THE RIDGWAY CO.



THE trait of human character that dies hardest before the advance of civilization is the love of adventure, and it is consequently not at all surprising that there is more pure unalloyed adventure to be met with nowadays than there ever was before—pessimists notwithstanding. Nature always finds some means, the best means, of supplying a universal want. But, like the knights-errant of old, you must go out armed cap-a-pie to look for it.

Listen then, you quiet, thinking men who love adventure and the quickening thrill of danger without notoriety. Here is a sport for you? You can limit your expenses to suit your own pocket-book. You need join no club, for the open sea will be your club, and the gulls will be your club-mates You will have no rules to obey, save what you make yourself for your own safety and convenience. You will be carefree and independent. It will give full scope to your courage and resource and self-reliance; and daily—no, hourly!—it will bring you face to face with some new predicament that will call for instant decision and action treading on the heel of thought. Try single-handed yachting!

Like everything in the world that is worth doing, single-handed yachting is a hard school for the beginner. It is as different from ordinary yachting as food is different from drink. It will tax your courage and determination to the utmost from the very start, as well as your power of observation. And it will call for the exercise of more discretion than any other sport in a world that is full of sports. Nobody can teach you but yourself, and you can teach yourself only by degrees.

There is only one school for the beginner who would really become one of the elect—the small boat. You must become a waterman before you tackle anything else. A man who can sail a canoe, and sail her properly, in any sort of wind or weather, is past master of his art, and can be safely trusted with any sort of craft anywhere. Remember that. But begin with a small open boat—the smaller the better—and spend at least a season poking about in harbors and rivers, or any kind of inland water, sailing her when you can, and rowing when you must.

Never take anybody with you, and never call on any one to help you. If you take an amateur with you he will probaly get frightened and fluster you; and if you take a hired man he will try to teach you, and will surely teach you wrong, besides doing things for you that you ought to do yourself. At the end of a season of that sort of thing you will have found out for yourself a whole crowd of things that will be of inestimable service to you later on, when you have passed through your novitiate; your hands will be hard and horny; your muscles will feel firm and comfortable underneath your coat; and your health will amaze you nearly as much as your appetite.

Almost the first thing you will discover will be that your principal requirement as a single-hander is nerve—a nerve that is alive, but panic-proof. If you have that, combined with a real love of adventure and the spirit of independence; and if you start with the determination to do everything for yourself and do it properly after finding out for yourself which is the proper way; if you enjoy real hard work in the open air for your own amusement, you are in a fair way to become a single-hander even before you start. But however good your nerve may be, it will need that preliminary small-boat training before you can trust yourself safely on the open sea.

Once you are sure of yourself, and have mastered the first principles of almost the most difficult art in the whole world, that of small boat sailing, the whole world of adventure will be at your feet, the Seven Seas and all the navigable rivers are yours to explore, and you can put out on the only remaining trail where nothing is stale and monotonous and where every wave and hollow, every creek and inlet, though as old as the everlasting ages, is to each sea-borne adventurer unexplored, alluring, and absolutely new. Nothing ever happens twice in the same way at sea, or ever looks quite the same twice running. There are no beaten tracks to follow, for the sea obliterates them. It is all new always—yours to plow up and explore to your heart's content.

But steady! That is what is ahead of you. You are no single-hander yet! And if you leave your small boat in the harbor and go sailing on some one else's yacht, or buy a yacht of your own that is too big for you to handle by yourself, you will never be one. The worst thing you can do is to get into the grip of the hired man. The next worst thing is to make one of a yachting party. In either case you will learn to believe that it takes three or four men to reef a mainsail, and at least two men to get up anchor; that varnished decks are things to be desired; that you should run for shelter when it comes on to blow, a gale of wind, and other heresies of that sort.

Stick to your own opinions that you have begun to form already as the result of your first season's experience, stick to your original intention of becoming a single-hander, and, above all things, stick for the present to your small boat. Put her to sea. Practice [illegible] the river. To a certain extent you have become a waterman; now learn seamanship. The lesson will take you all your life to learn, but you will get three or four men's share of pleasure from the learning of it. You will be learning something that no one else can teach you, and that you can't pass on when you have done with it; something that will be exclusively and peculiarly your own; and in the process you will learn to know yourself. You will find that you are worth knowing.

At this stage of the game it will pay you well to cultivate the society of fishermen—not on their smacks, but ashore when their work is done. Like all men who have been pickled and salted down by the sea, they are a good-natured breed, and what many of them know about knots and splices and the use of the marlinspike would fill volumes. If you are intelligent you will find that they like teaching you almost as much as they like whisky and tobacco—even your whisky and tobacco; when they find that you don't patronize them and won't be patronised, their hearts will go out to you—big, strong, sea-salted hearts; you will find that they have a brand of humor exclusively their own, and an insight that you never dreamed of. Their company is good.

But beware of their ideas on seamanship! They will voice the usual belief that single-handers are mad, and that any port in a storm is better than no port; both of which beliefs are rank heresy! But listen to them when they talk of using the lead, for the sounding-lead is to a seaman what his nose is to a hound, and more. They will probably tell you that a forty-pound anchor is heavy enough for any one man to handle in a tideway, but as the size of the yacht you intend to handle later on must depend on the size of the anchor you can manage without assistance, and on nothing else, you will do well to remember that there is a veteran who has been sailing single-handed around the English Coast for something like forty years, who uses an anchor weighing a hundred and twenty pounds, for a yacht of some thirty tons register!

And he does not buoy his anchor and leave it in a tide-rip when the glass is falling and he is in a hurry to be off. He gets it up and inboard, and cats it down on deck sailor-wise before he starts. Things like that depend on seamanship; and seamanship can be learned only on the high seas from personal experience. Spend most of your time, then, on the high seas in your little open sailing-boat, and in your spare time study the ways of fishermen.

The basis of your future independence will be your sea-anchor; and you must never under any circumstances, or for any reason whatever, put to sea without one. It is nothing but a canvas bag, distended on an iron ring and lashed on to the end of a rope or warp. Without it you are at the mercy of the wind and waves, but with it, if you use it properly, you are absolutely safe. And its use is one of the simplest things connected with a boat.

Most accidents at sea occur when running for shelter before a storm, or from running before the wind until it is too late to heave to without swamping the boat. Get into your head that the safest place in a storm is the open sea, and the most dangerous place is the entrance to a harbor. With your sea anchor out in front of you at the end of a good stout warp to keep your boat's nose into the wind, you will be safe in any storm that blows, provided that with seamanlike discretion you have furled your sails and made everything fast in time. And, provided that your boat is of the right sort, you will be warm and dry. So get in the way of using your sea anchor, even when there is no necessity, and learn to place implicit confidence in it.

The next most important thing to your sea anchor is the lead; you absolutely must learn to take soundings. You will discover that there are easier things to do than to handle a small boat and take soundings at the same time, even in shallow water; [illegible] and mates of coasting schooners can "smell their way" from port to port in a fog, though it will be some time before you will be able to perform that feat of seamanship yourself.

Any one but a single-hander who witnessed your early efforts would laugh at you; but after a little while it will dawn on you that the only opinion in the world that really matters is that of other single-handers, and even then only to the extent that it agrees with your own. A single-hander is always an opinionated man; and before you have been a year at the game you will be as opinionated as the rest of them.

Fancy working hard for two seasons in an open boat and dreaming all the while, as you will be dreaming, of the little yacht you mean to have when you can trust yourself to handle her and feel that at last you can do her justice—and then sharing her with a hireling!! Wouldn't you rather wait even another season, if necessary, and have her all to yourself? One more season's careful planning will do your prospects no harm. There will be thousands of things to think of—not least of them is the rig and the tonnage of your yacht. No one can advise you on those two points, because no two single-handers think alike.

But although no single-hander ever took any one's advice regarding the type or size of yacht that he should purchase, there are certain broad rules that may be laid down for the guidance of the beginner. And the first of them is: Never buy a yacht of any kind without first of all submitting her to the examination of an independent expert. Later on you will become an expert yourself, but as you intend to trust your yacht with your life it would be an unseamanlike and lubberly thing to do to buy one without taking every reasonable and possible precaution.

The next thing to bear in mind is that the last thing that you want for your purpose is a yacht of the racing type. You are going to live on board your yacht, possibly for weeks at a time. You need a yacht that will be dry and warm and comfortable. You want head-room down below, and room to cook and stow your stores and spare sails. And a large water tank is an absolute necessity. A yacht of the cruiser type is what you must look out for. Whatever her rig, she must have a long, straight keel, so that she will heave to, and stay hove to, and take the ground, when necessary, or in case of accident, on an even bottom.

One more rule must be emphatically laid down for the beginner's guidance, and that is that power in any shape or form, electricity, petroleum, steam or gasoline, is something belonging to the devil, to be dabbled with perhaps by yachtsmen, but to be eschewed—along with all other contrivances of the devil—by the single-hander.

Knowing what you know now of seamanship, you can cross the Atlantic if you want to, and pick up the Bishop's Rock Light on the other side some fine morning! Doesn't that appeal to you? Never forget, as you lie there in the bosom of the sea, to pray for the unhappy landsman, who has to make his bed on dry land and has yet to taste his freedom, and the feeling of unmitigated bliss that belongs only to the single-hander!

But he must be a selfish man, this single-hander, this hermit of the deep who keeps to himself on his little yacht! Is he? Ask the other fellows, the men that know. The sea does not breed selfish men. The single-hander has looked alone at the broad Atlantic, racing foam-topped before a shrieking wind, and laughed in the teeth of it. His heart is too bold for meannesses. Out on the sea there he has learned to know himself, and he knows how to look over and beyond the weaknesses of others. The only thing that could make a single-hander mean would be to take his yacht away!

Go, then, and be a single-hander! You will never forget it as long as you live. In health and strength and peace of mind, and everything that counts for happiness, you will be better off; and you will meet with some new adventure every day you live. Show me a single-hander and I will show you a good citizen, one that will fight for his country if need be, a man who, when the horizon looks gray and ugly, will know that there is blue water somewhere out beyond it, and will set out, with hatches battened down and sails double-reefed and with proper and seamanlike caution, to find it.

He's not what you would call spectacular. On board his yacht he usually wears a sweater that once was clean, and an old pair of flannel trousers. His feet, which are usually bare, are unhandsome from hard use and sun and salt water. He is as much unlike the fashionable yachtsman as any one you could imagine. And he doesn't talk much. But he is a man who has formed a habit of getting there, and though the place he wants to go to is seldom much good from a business point of [illegible]

Awful.

The president of the university had dark circles under his eyes. His cheek was pallid; his lips were trembling; he wore a haunted expression. Every now and then he turned and glanced apprehensively behind him.

"You look ill," said his wife. "What is wrong, dear?"

"Nothing much," he replied. "But—I—I had a fearful dream last night, and I feel this morning as if—as if I—" He hesitated and stammered. It was evident that his nervous system was shattered.

"What was the dream?" asked his wife.

"I—I—dreamed the trustees required that—that I should—that I should pass the freshman examination for—admission!" sighed the president.—Youth's Companion.

A WONDERFUL DISCOVERY.
In this age of research and experiment, all nature is ransacked by the scientist for the comfort and happiness of man. Science has indeed made giant strides in the past century, and among the—by no means least important—discoveries in medicine is that of Therapion, which has been used with great success in French Hospitals and that it is worthy the attention of those who suffer from kidney, bladder, nervous diseases, chronic weaknesses, ulcers, skin eruptions, piles, &c., there is no doubt. In fact it seems evident from the big stir created amongst specialists, that THERAPION is destined to cast into oblivion all those questionable remedies that were formerly the sole reliance of medical men. It is of course impossible to tell sufferers all we should like to tell them in this short article, but those who would like to know more about this remedy that has effected so many—we might almost say, miraculous cures, should send addressed envelope for FREE book to Dr. Le Clerc Med. Co., Haverstock Road, Hampstead, London, Eng. and decide for themselves whether the New French Remedy "THERAPION" No. 1, No. 2 or No. 3 is what they require and have been seeking in vain during a life of misery, suffering, ill health and unhappiness. Therapion is sold by druggists or mail $1.00. Fougera Co., 90 Beekman St., New York.

REAL STORIES FROM THE LIFE OF A MASTER ADVENTURER

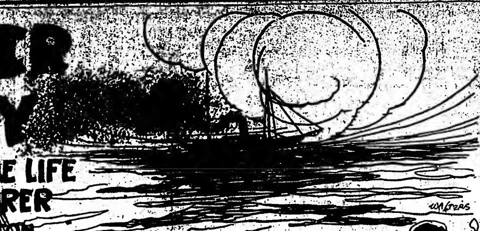
COPYRIGHT BY RIDGWAY COMPANY



(Editor's Note—Capt. George B. Boynton died a few months ago in Brooklyn. He served, all told, under eighteen flags and his life has furnished much material for fiction. This is a story of some of his adventures told by himself for the first time.)

IN the old days, when I was cavorting with contraband throughout the West Indies and South America I ran into one unpleasant incident which left me with a large moral—or immoral, according to the point of view—obligation on my hands. During a quiet spell I had bought, at a bargain, a little schooner at St. Thomas, loaded her with mahogany at Santo Domingo and started for Liverpool to see what was going on in that part of the world. We were caught in a heavy gale and were forced to run into Yarmouth, Nova Scotia, where we arrived in a sinking condition.

On the false charge that my papers were forged, the agent for Lloyds', with whom the ship was insured, seized the vessel as I was having her repaired and had me arrested for barratry. I was taken to Halifax, where I was put to considerable inconvenience in securing bail.

I pleaded my own case and, as soon as I could get a hearing, was released, but in the meantime the agent for the underwriters had libeled my ship and sold her at auction, and her new owners had sent her away to South America.

My last real adventure had ended with the burial of the Leckwith, which sank in the Red Sea, and I was hungry for some new excitement—the very essence and sole enjoyment of my life. While casting about for something to satisfy my appetite, the recollection of the Yarmouth outrage came over me and I decided to steal a ship and let the underwriters pay for her, as partial compensation for the one they had stolen from me.

After a survey of the available supply, I hit on the Ferret, a handsome and fairly fast little passenger steamer belonging to the Highland Railway Company, which was lying at Goorock Bay on the Clyde. They would not let her out on a general charter, which was what I wanted, so I concluded to charter her for a year for a cruise in the Mediterranean, with the option of purchase for fourteen thousand pounds at the end of that time. All of the negotiations were conducted and the deal closed by Joe Wilson, my trusted aide, and I was careful to impress him with the necessity for the insertion of the option-of-purchase clause. I had so much confidence in him that I did not closely examine the charter papers and not until it was too late did I discover that he had neglected the one vital point.

My plan was to go back out East and dig up the guns Frank Norton and I had buried on a little island when we left the China Sea, and perhaps resume the unholy occupation of preying on the pirates between Singapore and Hong Kong. I wanted the option-of-purchase clause inserted in the charter partly as a sop to my conscience and partly with the idea that if we were, by any remote chance, apprehended before we reached the China Sea I could announce that I had exercised my option and was prepared to pay for the ship.

With the delivery of the charter, in proper form, as I supposed, I made a great show of fitting the ship out for a yachting cruise, at the same time smuggling on board two small cannon and a lot of rifles and ammunition. Lorensen, my old captain, was seriously ill, so I took on as sailing-master a man named Watkins. He was well recommended, but it later developed that he had a strain of negro blood and a well-defined streak of yellow. Tom Leigh, one of my old men, was first officer, and next to him was George Ross, another new one.

We coaled at Cardiff and cleared for Malaga. We passed Gibraltar late in the afternoon, as was intended, and signaled "All well" to the observer for Lloyds'. As soon as it was dark we headed over toward the other shore for twelve or fifteen miles and then stood straight out to sea again. As we made the second change in our course we stove in a couple of our boats and threw them overboard, along with a lot of life-preservers. I wanted to make it appear that the Ferret had foundered, and we ran into a heavy blow which dovetailed beautifully into my scheme. At daylight we were well clear of Gibraltar but within sight of the Moroccan coast. I called the crew aft and addressed them to this effect:

"Taking advantage of the option-of-purchase clause in the charter I now declare myself the owner of this ship and will pay for her, as stipulated, at the end of the period for which she is chartered. We are going on a very different trip from that for which you signed. It will be attended by some danger but, probably, by profits which will more than compensate you for the risk you run. Those of you who wish to go with me will receive double pay, a bonus of fifty dollars for signing new papers, and a share of the profits from the trip. Those who do not care to go may take a boat and go ashore."

Every man agreed to stay with me. I thereupon rechristened the ship the India—a name legitimately held by a vessel on the other side of the world, as was indicated by Lloyds' register—fired a gun and dipped the flag and declared her in commission. At the same time I rechristened myself, a ceremony to which I was equally accustomed, and took the name of James Stuart Henderson. I presented the ship with [illegible] log and certificate of registry and [illegible] necessary papers from the counterfeit blanks I always carried, and all of the men signed the new articles. We then headed for Santos, Brazil, with the idea of keeping clear of British waters until the loss of the Ferret had become an established fact.

Capt George B. Boynton

On the way the brass plate on the main beam, showing that the engines were built for the Ferret, was removed and the new name took the place of the old one everywhere about the ship. The chart-room and wheel-house were taken off the bridge and rebuilt over the wheel amidships. Some of the upper works were stripped away and the whole appearance of the vessel was changed to such an extent that even her builders would hardly have recognized her.

At Santos I bought outright a cargo of coffee and headed for Cape Town, South Africa, where I consigned it to Wm. G. Anderson & Son, with instructions to sell it for cash, and quickly.

I made Leigh sailing-master, and we cleared light for Australia, with a short stop at the Mauritius for coal. We coaled again at Albany, West Australia. From there we went to Port Adelaide, South Australia, and then on to Melbourne, where we came to grief. Off Port Philip Head we signaled for a pilot and a canny Scot came aboard. He seemed suspicious of us from the first and I noticed that he was studying the ship closely as we steamed up to anchorage off Williamstown.

I landed at once and went to the Civil Service Club Hotel to recuperate from a bad case of malaria which I had contracted at the Mauritius. While not alarmed by the apparent suspicion of the pilot I was impressed by it and gave strict orders to Leigh to allow no one to come aboard. Leigh's one weakness was drink, and to guard against his becoming helplessly intoxicated I instructed Wilson either to remain on board or visit the ship every day.

My fever grew worse after I went ashore, and in two or three days the doctor decided that I should have a nurse, as I was all alone. The doctor was with me when the nurse arrived, and as the latter entered the door the doctor made a quick movement as though something had startled him, looking in amazement from one of us to the other. I could not imagine what had happened until he said:

"That man looks enough like you to be your twin brother! I never have seen such a resemblance between two men!"

I surveyed the nurse more critically and saw that we did look strangely alike, even to the scarred face. The nurse said his name was William Nourse and that he had arrived in Melbourne only two or three days before from Tasmania, where he had worked in the Hobartstown hospital.

While I was recovering at the hotel, events were transpiring in connection with the ship. Wilson, it developed, soon relaxed his vigilance and gave himself up to pleasures ashore, but without coming near me, whereupon old Leigh blithely betook himself to his beloved bottle. After a few days the shrewd Scotch pilot paid the ship a friendly visit, found Leigh full three sheets in the wind, encouraged him to proceed with his potations until he fell asleep and then went over the ship at his leisure, taking measurements and making observations.

Naturally, his measurements corresponded exactly with those of the Ferret, which had been reported as missing.

I was greatly surprised when, late one afternoon about ten days after our arrival at Melbourne, I received word from Joe that the ship had been recognized as the Ferret and seized; that he had taken to the bush and that I had better disappear as quickly and quietly as possible if I wished to escape arrest, for the officers were looking for both of us.

I told Nourse that a warrant was out for my arrest on some technical violation of the port regulations, and that, while I had no fear of the result of a trial, I did not feel strong enough to go through with it, and therefore I intended to leave at once, and secretly, and stay away until the trouble blew over. He agreed to go with me, and soon after dark we left the hotel quietly by a rear entrance which opened on an alley.

We engaged a carriage and drove to a suburb on the railroad running to Sydney.

On the long drive to Longwood I became convinced that my capture was certain, for the country was so thinly settled that we were sure to attract attention and be easily followed, while if I stuck to the railroad I was sure to be apprehended. In seeking some way [illegible] the dilemma [illegible] of having Nourse take my place.

"What do you say, Nourse, to changing places with me and letting yourself be arrested, if it comes to that?"

"I had been thinking of that very thing," he replied. "I don't care much what happens to me, but I am not exactly hungry for a long term in Peatridge. If this thing is no worse than you say it is, though, I'll swap places with you and see it through for two hundred pounds."

I accepted his terms without argument.

As soon as we reached Longwood we exchanged clothing, even down to our underwear, socks and shoes.

We had just finished dinner and were sitting alone in the hotel office, rehearsing the part Nourse was to play, when a sergeant and two officers, who had got track of us at Seymour, rode up on horseback.

The orders of the officers called for the arrest of only one man, so I was not interfered with. I did not return to Melbourne on the same train with them the next morning, but went down by the one that followed it. The first thing I heard was that Joe, who had taken the train ahead of me, had been captured at Albury, and was on his way back, in charge of an officer, to join Leigh and my counterfeit presentment behind the bars.

I at once engaged Purvis, the best barrister in Australia, to defend them, and later employed Gillot & Snowden, another high-class firm, to assist him.

Nourse was as game as a hornet and played his part well.

The trial was held before Judge Williams and resulted in a conviction. I had expected no other verdict, for, with the option-of-purchase clause missing from the charter, it was a clear case.

Nourse and Wilson were sentenced to seven years and Leigh to three and one-half years in Pentridge Prison. With the time deducted for good behavior this meant five years and three months for Nourse and Joe and less than three years for Leigh. When the case assumed a more serious aspect than I had believed it would when I bargained with Nourse to take my place I sent word to him that I would pay him well if he would "play the string out," and as soon as I left the town I deposited $5,000 which was to be paid to him when he was released. I spent some time and considerable money in an effort to secure a pardon for my companions, but when I found that was impossible I returned to England, with a promise to be back in Australia by the time their terms expired.

With my return to London in the early eighties the old lure of the West Indies, with their continuous riot of revolutions, came over me so strongly that I could not hold out against it, nor did I try.

I was much interested in reports which reached me, through contraband channels, that a new revolution was shaping up in Costa Rica and that there was a prospect of trouble in Hayti and even in Venezuela.

I took the first ship for Halifax and went from there to St. John, New Brunswick, where I bought the fore-and-aft schooner George V. Richards. I took her to Bridgeport, Connecticut, where I loaded up with old Sharp's and Remington rifles and a lot of ammunition and, after burying them under sixty tons of coal, sailed for Venezuela to see what was going on in Guzman's absence.

I found that General Alcantara was acting as dummy President, while Guzman was enjoying himself in Europe, and I soon satisfied myself, from remarks dropped by his friends in response to my guarded inquiries, that he was ambitious to become the ruler of Venezuela in fact as well as in name.

The movement to overthrow Guzman was, in fact, taking definite form, and I sold a part of my arms to Alcantara's friends.

Guzman had heard of what was going on and, as I subsequently learned, he returned [illegible] before the revolt that was being hatched had broken its shell. The Government was promptly turned over to him by Alcantara.

The Costa Ricans were, I found, in the midst of one of their periodical but always quite futile efforts to depose their President, General Tomaso Guardie, and I had no difficulty in disposing of my arms and ammunition, which I exchanged for a cargo of coffee.

With the cargo of coffee we headed for New Orleans, where I sold it.

While the coffee was coming out stores were swiftly going in, and we were out of the river again and on our way to Hayti in record-breaking time. Though I had good cause to remember Santo Domingo I never had been in the "Black Republic," and, as I had heard there was a probability of some lively times there, I determined to visit it before I returned to New York.

But the crankiness of the Richards interfered with my plans. When we were about one hundred miles west of Key West the old ship committed suicide by burning herself to death. The fire started in the hold amidships, but we could not even imagine what might have caused it. It was so unexpected that it had a good start before we discovered it. We fought it, of course, but we might as well have tried to quench a volcano in eruption. The strange craft had made up her mind to go under, and there was nothing for us to do but take to the whaleboat, which was large enough for all of us, as I had only a small crew.

After we had shoved off we returned at considerable risk to rescue a big black cat which was on the ship when I bought her. We had christened him "John Croix"

Our humanity was well rewarded, for John saved our lives, or at least saved us from a lot of suffering. Eventually we drifted among the islands to the westward of Key West and we headed for the largest one in sight. In the heavy sea that was running we made a bad mess of the landing. Our boat was overturned and stove in, the bung came out of the water-cask and all of our supplies and most of our instruments were lost.

Early in the morning the cat awakened me by rubbing against my face. At first I thought he was only depressed, like the rest of us, and wanted company, but he pestered around until I got up and followed him. Calling to me over his shoulder, he led the way to a clump of mangrove trees, whose roots overhung the bank three feet above high tide. John trotted under the mass of roots and began to purr loudly. I started to follow him and then backed out, but the cat yowled so loudly that I got down on all fours again and followed him. I crawled along for ten or twelve feet until I found John standing over a rivulet of fresh water about as big as my finger.

I drank my fill from it and then awakened the others and told them of John's discovery. They hailed him as our savior, and when he came trotting into camp a couple of hours later with an oyster in his mouth they were ready to beatify him.

Strengthened and encouraged, we patched up our boat and, when the storm had blown itself out, put to sea again, and encountered a little schooner from St. Johns, Fla., which took us to Key West, where we soon got a ship for New York.

I returned to Melbourne in 1885, after an absence of about four years, and went to Menzies' Hotel, which was not the one I had stopped at before—when I was James Stuart Henderson.

When Nourse and Wilson were released from prison the former scurried across Bass Strait to his old Tasmanian home with the money I had paid him for so successfully impersonating me. He considered that he had been well compensated and expected to invest his capital in some small business, to which affluent position, under ordinary conditions, he never could have aspired with any degree of confidence.

ODD ISLAND TRIBE

Queer Inhabitants of the Land of Siar.

Whole Population Number Only 140, Yet Forms a Distinct Tribe With Manners and Customs Peculiar to Itself.

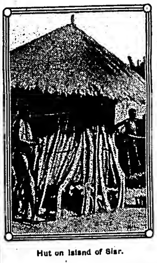
Friedrich Wilhelm Hafen. — No international exposition or large fair is supposed to be complete nowadays without its native village, where two score or so of men, women and children, preferably cannibals, from some far distant land, and supposed to live more or less in their native state for the edification of the curious.

A visit to Siar reminds one irresistibly of such an exposition village; the difference being that the inhabitants instead of displaying their charms to crowds of civilized visitors, are engaged in doing so to each other. It is hard, on visiting the island, to realize that the natives are specially got up for one's particular benefit.

The island of Siar, which is less than a mile round, lies in an archipelago on the coast of German New Guinea and close to the principal port in the colony, Friedrich Wilhelm Hafen. This town boasts of a white population of about 25 and contains only ten or a dozen houses half hidden among the cocoanut trees.

The whole population of the island of Siar is about 140, and these people really constitute a tribe distinct from the inhabitants of the mainland or of the other islands. The natives of the mainland, who are themselves sufficiently curious people to excite the wonder of anybody, are ready and anxious to point out the islanders to visitors and make money out of one by rowing one over in a boat on the monthly visit of a steamer.

On approaching the island nothing is seen but the dense vegetation which covers it all over. However, on penetrating a few yards inland two clearings are reached around which are grouped 30 or so huts that form the village. The word hut is really too dignified a one to describe their rude dwellings; strictly speaking, they live, eat and sleep on a straw and wooden platform raised four or five feet from the ground, and which is covered over by a rudely-thatched grass roof. There are no sides to the dwelling, the front and back being generally quite open, although the slanting roof extends so far down as to form eaves which come below the level of the platform. Access to the platform is furnished by some logs placed so as to form a sloping ladder and in addition to the main one the Papuans have a custom of providing a smaller one to be used by the dogs.



Hut on Island of Siar.

What little work needs to be done on the island seems to be done by the women; the men are apparently too deeply occupied in exhibiting themselves to the other members of the community. Their costumes may be said to consist of a loin cloth, which is really the only article of actual dress they have; however, to make up for the lack of tailor-made garments, the rest of the body is fairly covered with miscellaneous ornaments. Every man has around his forehead a large number of dog's teeth made into a necklace; these teeth are looked upon as being quite necessary, and the desire not to be without them is so strong that a few of them are usually sufficient to buy a wife. These teeth form a good setting for his elaborate headdress; the hair is carefully fuzzed up, dyed a rusty red, surmounted by a flat circular shell, and decorated with feathers and colored grasses, sticking outward and upward a distance of a foot or more.

THUGS DRESSED AS WOMEN

New York.—Thugs dressed as women attacked Mrs. May Bernheimer at her home in a fashionable uptown apartment house a few days ago, beat her into insensibility, bound and gagged her and escaped with gems valued at $10,000.

Mrs. Bernheimer told the police that her maid met her at the door, upon her return from a shopping expedition and welcomed her with a blow upon the head with a potato masher. A second blow knocked her unconscious, she said.

Strange Carriage Has All Guessing

I JUST WONDER WHAT THAT IS—THERE IS SOME MYSTERY CONNECTED WITH IT, I'M SURE

WASHINGTON.—For some five years past, the residents of Sixteenth street have been thoroughly mystified and made not a little curious by the presence of a most unusual carriage, which from time to time appears there.

It is an ordinary brougham, very spick and span, drawn by one horse, a black one, and beautifully caparisoned. The coachman is a large man, with a clean shaven, florid face and iron-gray hair, usually wearing a black coat. Thus far the carriage is most conventional, but when the eye lights on the doors it stops, and one is tempted to turn and take a second look; for, instead of the usual glass at the windows, there are oak panels filling the entire space. Each has a crescent-shaped hole cut near the top, as if to admit air to some one inside.

Only on bright, sunny days, spring and fall it may be seen, and usually in the morning.

At short intervals the driver leans around, first on one side and then on the other, and looks carefully in at the front window, which is of glass. This continues for four or five hours at a time some days, and it is almost too much for the curiosity of the Sixteenth street people, who have noticed it. A good many thought it must be an invalid, or maybe an imbecile, while some suggested dogs, cats, or even snakes.

Finally one day an enterprising young resident of Sixteenth street, on her way home, decided that she would at least get a peep inside, so accordingly she went to the curb and nearly lost her balance in the attempt as the carriage went by, but the empty seat only greeted her eye, and no queer face or form.

"He must be on the other side," she said to herself. "I'll get him when he comes back."

So when it returned she was there ready, but not a sign of life was to be seen within.

"Probably he has moved over," was the young lady's conclusion, and she pursued her way, but on reaching home another girl was seen on the opposite curb, staring down the street.

"Did you see that carriage?" she called. "I'm dying to know what's in it!"

When next it came up, a girl moved toward it from either curb and took a look.

Empty!

The mystery is still a mystery.

Your Uncle Sam Has Books to Burn

IT'S A SIN TO DESTROY ALL OF THOSE BOOKS—

THAT you, Mr. Voter may get just the government publications that are of interest to you, and that you may be spared the expense of printing costly books which serve no further purpose than would a friendly postal card, congress is strenuously attempting to reform itself with relation to the business of printing. To accomplish this congress has appointed a joint commission to investigate its monster printing bills, and that commission has reported that the wastes in this direction amount to tons of millions, and that, despite the great expense, the end aimed at is not accomplished.

Uncle Sam has, the commission states, a gang of laborers at work regularly destroying books which it has cost him millions of dollars to print. Almost any day these workmen may be seen with axes chopping vigorously into great stacks of leather and cloth bound books such as would be an ornament to any library.

Every few years the government finds itself the possessor of vast quantities of printed matter stored in many basements as is grain in granaries. In the vaults under the capitol it is no uncommon matter to find a thousand tons of worthless public documents which congress finds itself unable to even give away. Yet these documents have cost millions of dollars in the printing, and these millions, according to congress itself, are absolutely wasted.

Every day through the congressional season there is mailed from the capitol and the house and senate office buildings an average of 20 tons of printed matter.

Stray Yellow Dog Finds Good Friend

EVEN in staid and sedate Washington an amusing scene will occur and a stray yellow dog will find a friend. The gallant Ambassador Jusserand of France, in faultless attire, was returning from a ball where he had delivered an address. A liveried footman was holding open the door of his carriage, and the coachman, sitting stiffly on the box, was the very picture of convention. The chivalrous ambassador was bowing right and left, when his eye fell upon a little dog who had made his way through the crowd and stood in front of him. The little animal looked beseechingly up into the eyes of the great diplomat, who forgot his white gloves and stooped down to pat the dusty head. But the sudden motion frightened the dog, who was used to being kicked and beaten, and with his tail between his legs he scampered away.

The ambassador thrust away all dignity of diplomatic custom, and to the bewilderment of an amased crowd, he pursued the fleeing canine while society folks looked on at the novel chase. The dog's four legs made better time than the ambassador's two, and Mr. Jusserand sought the help of the footman. That liveried gentleman shook his skirts of dignity, descended from his mighty seat and overtook the dog, which he delivered to the waiting ambassador. In triumph Mr. Jusserand tucked his new friend under his arm, and swung into the carriage.—Chappie's News-Letter.

Plan to Stop Cats' Midnight Opera

EDICT
CATS WILL BE IMPOUNDED AND PUT TO DEATH—
WELL OF—

THE species of cat that takes delight in ensconcing itself upon the back fence at undesirable hours and serenading would-be sleepers is doomed. The habitue of the alley has incurred the displeasure of the commissioners, and as all other offenders who arouse the ire of the District officials, his punishment will be swift and terrible.

An edict issued at the District building the other day provides that all stray cats hereafter found roaming at large will be impounded and put to death. The unfortunate feline must in the future be confined to the premises of its owner, or, should its mistress deem it necessary to take it for an airing, it must be held in leash. The law for the impounding of dogs provides that the animal may be recovered upon payment by the owner of two dollars, but no such leniency is extended to the cat.

Nine cats have been impounded since July 1 last year, the commissioners say, and each of the "pets" is accused of being afflicted with rabies. They also were accused of biting 11 persons. It is to prevent a spread of the dread disease, the officials declare, that the amendment to the police regulations is made.

The term "running at large" is held by the authorities to have the same meaning as in the proclamation relating to the muzzling of dogs.

This is not the first proposition to place a tax on cats. Such a measure was under consideration by the board of commissioners several years ago, but it met with serious opposition by the Washington Cat Club, of which Mrs. Henry L. West, wife of former Commissioner West, was president. No action was [illegible]

SEEKS WAYS TO ABOLISH WAR

Baroness Bertha von Suttner of Vienna, famous among other things because it was she who inspired the founding of the Nobel prizes, is in America on a mission unique among those undertaken by women of the Old World among the women of the New. She is here to tell her sisters what she knows of the horrors of war and to appeal to the women of the United States to do their utmost toward the abolition of war.

The campaign for peace undertaken last spring by Baron d'Estournelles de Constant of France was noteworthy. For three months Baron d'Estournelles, himself a Nobel prize winner, went through the country, and everywhere his arguments were heard with interest. So also in the case of Count Albert Apponyi people crowded to hear what the Hungarian parliamentarian had to say about the cost of armed peace now prevailing in Europe. But, much as these advocates for peace accomplished here, there stood arrayed against them continually the plea of necessity, the plea that ever increasing armaments were an absolute essential. Neither the Frenchman nor the Hungarian cared to depart from parliamentary usages, and for this reason they permitted their arguments to go before the people exactly for what they were worth.

STIMSON APPROVES NEW BILL

A substitute for the militia pay bill has been submitted to Secretary Stimson and has secured his approval. The pay of officers of the militia in this bill is a percentage of that of officers of like grade in the regular army, not including longevity pay, as follows: Five per cent. to all general officers commanding a division or brigade, including authorized officers detailed for duty therewith, the division and brigade inspectors of small arms practice, if any, the authorized aide chaplains; 20 per cent. to commanding officers of companies, troops, battalions and ambulance companies and to adjutants and quartermasters of regiments, independent battalions, squadrons and coast artillery districts, including medical officers doing duty or assigned to regiments or smaller tactical units or coast artillery districts, medical officers serving with field hospitals and veterinarians.

The enlisted men, it is provided, shall receive compensation at the same rate as the enlisted man of the corresponding grade of the regular army at the rate of 25 per cent. of the initial pay now provided by law for enlisted men of corresponding grade of the regular army, provided no soldier shall have attended not less than 45 regular drills during one year and a proportionate amount for attendance upon a lesser number of such drills not less than 20. No money is to be paid to any person not on the active list, nor to any person not over 64 years of age, nor to any person who fails to qualify as to fitness for military service.

C. P. NEILL, THE STRIKE FIXER

Perhaps no man in the United States, or in the whole world, occupies such a happy position between the mighty industrial elements—capital and labor—as does Dr. Charles P. Neill, commissioner of labor, who has averted scores of large strikes, involving thousands upon thousands of men, through his remarkable tact and ability to solve economic problems. Since 1905 Commissioner Neill has been instrumental in settling 47 controversies directly involving 163,650 employes and 505,880 miles of railroad.

Born in Illinois in 1865, the future "strike fixer" was taken to Texas by his parents five years later. He now prides himself on the fact that he is a Texan, and in fact was known in college as "The Tall Mesquite of the Rio Grande."

After a brilliant college career, Dr. Neill was appointed instructor of political economy at the Catholic University in Washington, and took an active interest in civic affairs, besides serving as recorder in several coal strike arbitrations. He had much to do with the settlement of the anthracite coal strike of 1902, the adjustment of the miners' strike troubles in Nevada in 1907, the averting of a nation-wide telegraphers' strike, and the story of his intervention and mediation has been the same in each case—peace restored.

HADLEY PREFERS LOG CABIN

Governor Hadley of Missouri lives in a log cabin because he likes better than a mansion. He has the mansion, too—to everybody in Missouri the governor's house in Jefferson City always has been known as "The Mansion"—and Governor Hadley might live there all the time if he wished to, and at no expense of rent. But he prefers the log cabin in the summer time and he and his wife and three children live there from early May to late frost.

Governor Hadley built the log cabin himself, that is, he planned it and, after the logs were cut and hauled to the site he stood around with his hands in his pockets and bossed the job of house raising.

He invited everybody in Jefferson City out to the old fashioned house raisin'; it was a blanket invitation to the whole town and pretty nearly everybody went, including all the boys in town, and since then the governor is more modest in his invitations and names those that he wishes to have at his brush burning and other [illegible]

Budding Bandit is Nipped in the Bud

NEW YORK.—"Nipped in the Bud, or Nothing Doing for Dickey Boy," is the next novel to which will be drawn the attention of Richard Boy, a would-be bandit. Dickie Boy, who is five feet three and fifteen years old, armed himself with two big guns, a slungshot, seventeen dime novels, a Bible and a map of Arizona and started for the wild and woolly west to shoot down Indians and shoot up saloons.

The budding frontiersmen started the ball rolling the other afternoon by running amuck in his home at 59 West Ninety-third street. He did not shoot out any lights, but he scared the life out of his mother and two younger brothers and sisters. The terror of the West side declared he'd shoot 'em all up, and they got into closets and under beds while he strutted in his truly western splendor, rattling with artillery as he walked.

Policeman Fried was on fixed post when a man came along and told him about the miniature arsenal. It did not scare the policeman a bit. He sauntered over to the hallway and bore down on the embryonic western terror. Without pulling a gun on him and telling him to throw up his hands he grabbed him by the scruff of the neck, gave him an old-fashioned clout and said:

"Sonny, what have you got in your pockets?"

With an awful scowl the boy bandit faced his captor. The officer took him upstairs where the family was found in a condition of terror. Fried then took the pocket edition of Jesse James to the West side police station.

The two guns were fully loaded. The slungshot was one of the toughest looking weapons the police had ever seen. It was made up of nails and bits of steel and covered with leather, with a leathern thong attached to it for the wrist. The dime novels were wonders of literary art. They ran all the way from "Diamond Dick's Last Dive" to "Whonged into the Willies" and "Scarlet Sam's Sacrifice."

The youthful desperado was held by Magistrate Cornell in the West side police court without bail.

Militant Cow Puts Policemen to Rout

CHICAGO.—A spotted cow which answered with enthusiasm to the name of "Violet" came into East Chicago the other evening, approached the outer fringe to the political battlefield, and went mad.

At midnight Policeman John Lazar was walking his peaceful beat in the neighborhood of Chicago and Kennedy avenues when he met Violet and was seized with a sense of pastoral poetry and moonlight.

He approached Violet sympathetically and with a delicate motion of his arms sought to waft her in the direction she should go.

Violet refused to be wafted. She was in playful mood and showed a desire to place both her front feet at once on the policeman's shoulders.

He drew his club and shook it sternly in her face. She recognized no authority.

The policeman tried for two hours to pacify the cow. It was a vain attempt. He telephoned for help.

Chief of Police Leo McCormack of East Chicago got out of bed and headed a relief squad. Armed to the teeth the bluecoats descended upon the intrenchments of the cow. They were repulsed, and Violet went away.

At noon the next day Violet strolled down the Pennsylvania tracks near Baring avenue. Policeman Esantrager said he could conquer any cow.

He was rolled over in the street three times before he escaped.

Violet began to demolish freight trains on the tracks, when Policeman Harry Nanglo stole upon her from behind with a rifle.

Texas Will Fight Mosquito With Bat

SAN ANTONIO, Tex.—There is a man in Texas who has found out a new way to fight the mosquito. His name is Dr. Charles R. Campbell. He is official bacteriologist of the city of San Antonio.

His idea is to employ bats as mosquito fighters. The neighborhood of San Antonio is especially plagued by mosquitoes—malaria is more or less rife in that vicinity—and for a long time past the inhabitants of the municipality and its suburbs have eagerly sought to find a solution of the problem. Much benefit has been obtained by keeping minnows in cisterns and ponds—these small fishes being greedy devourers of mosquito larvae—but such measures have not altogether met requirements.

Bats, as is well known, are insect eaters, and are particularly fond of mosquitoes. In the twilight, when they rove abroad, they devour immense numbers of the pestiferous insects, the manner being to dash back and forth through a swarm and gobble the victims up by the wholesale.

In view of which fact it occurred to Dr. Campbell that it might be a good idea to establish in and about San Antonio a number of "bat roosts," as he calls them—that is to say, structures so contrived as to invite bats for sleeping purposes. He has already set up two of them, and proposes to erect others, those already in operation having proved highly successful.

There are no windows, but opportunity of entrance is afforded to the bats by a series of horizontal openings so arranged as to resemble the slats of an ordinary window shutter. The whole building is thirty feet high, the upper twenty feet being the inclosed portion, and the slatted arrangement runs up each of the two sides for a distance of sixteen feet.

Crate of Stolen Chickens on His Bed

PHILADELPHIA.—When Nathaniel Jones, colored, of Naudain street, near Tenth, discovered a number of live chickens on his bed he was so indignant that the publicity he gave to the matter resulted in the arrest of Edward Watkins, also colored, of Lombard street, near Fifteenth, who, it is charged, stole the poultry from a store at Eleventh and Rodman streets for a chicken dinner which he intended to give to two of his friends, Richard Green and Albert Emerson of Lombard street, near Tenth. The three men were brought before Magistrate Eisenbrown at the Central police station. After a hearing, Green and Emerson were discharged, but Watkins was held in $600 bail for court.

At the hearing, Jones said that when he returned from a theater he was astonished to find a crate of live chickens on his bed. Upon investigation, he said, he learned that the poultry had been brought there by Watkins. About the same time B. Wagner, a poultry dealer, reported to the Nineteenth district police that he had been robbed of a crate of chickens. When the police heard of Jones' indignation at finding a crate of chickens on his bed they put two and two together and started an investigation, which ended in the arrest of Watkins and his two friends. Green and Emerson showed that they had known nothing of the theft of the poultry, and were therefore released.

After holding Watkins in bail, Magistrate Eisenbrown asked Wagner to recall the line, "Lead us not into temptation," in the Lord's Prayer. "Don't you know better," he asked, "than to tempt these colored people by putting chickens out in front of your store?"

AN AMERICAN HABIT.

A Chicago doctor counts speed in eating as the cause of many of the bodily disorders from which people suffer, particularly in the business world. Quick lunches, the hasty bolting of food chosen because it is in sight and the rushing back to work without thought for the abused digestive organs, can only result, he declares, in a physical condition that invites diseases in variety. He is unquestionably right, says the Indianapolis Star. American people really care little about what they eat—this in spite of the fact that they possess hotels and restaurants in which all the luxuries of the world are served and markets which supply a wonderful variety of products. Notwithstanding what is open to them, as a class they are not fastidious as to quality. They have their preferences in foods, of course, but if what they especially care for is not immediately available, they accept what is at hand, gulp it down, dash off and forget within ten minutes what it was they ate. "Quick lunch" places are an institution of the time in the business district in all cities and have an enormous patronage. They came in response to a demand. The managers are not to blame because their patrons insist upon eating in the shortest possible time, nor is the food they serve necessarily at fault.

Simple eating is urged by a Berlin newspaper as a reform that should be aimed at in Germany for the salvation of society. The present extravagance in dining, it is asserted, threatens financial impoverishment as well as digestive ruin. Why is it that Germany has such famous spas? The intimation is made that the reason lies in the circumstance that Germany has so many gluttons, who go to the watering places, penitent in the spring and summer, to make amends for the over-eating and over-drinking of which they have been guilty during the winter. The Berlin paper says: It would be a genuine public service on the part of the leading society personages if they would begin by practical examples to wage war on the sensual luxuriousness of modern entertaining, as far as the culinary end of it is concerned. Only by a return to simple and sensible dinners can we avert genuine economic and physical perils. Circumspection in the same direction would not go amiss in the United States. There has been a growth of extravagance in the outlay for luxuries of the table. Many men of means have eaten themselves into evil physical condition.

Louisville is the nickel town of the country. No case is on record of a man or woman buying something costing less than $1 and giving a larger amount than the cost of the purchase that the shopkeeper didn't include several nickels in the change. If you trip around town shopping you'll find your pockets full of 5-cent pieces until you think you are the victim of a conspiracy until a native tells you it's a habit the town can't shake.

Chicago authorities are asked to prohibit the rear seat on motorcycles on the ground that "it encourages elopements." What gifted press agent for manufacturers of tandem motorcycles invented that glorious advertisement?

A St. Louis woman testified in a divorce suit that her husband pelted her with money, compelled her to spend $1,000 a month in clothes alone, and that she could not count all the money he gave her. And yet she was not satisfied. It may be remembered that some time ago another woman wanted a divorce because her husband was too perfect. The unrest among women of which one hears so much must have a queer twist in it.

WOODROW WILSON IS DEMOCRATIC NOMINEE

Governor Marshall His Running Mate.

Fortunes Take on New Lease of Life After 43rd—Rapid Strides Are Made in Voting as Soon as Delegates See That Clark Boom Has Collapsed.

Baltimore, Md. — Governor Wilson was nominated at 3:15 p. m., Tuesday, when Pennsylvania cast vote making total 733, breaking the long deadlock that had existed in the democratic convention since early Friday.

The final break to Governor Woodrow Wilson as the nominee for president of the United States came at the beginning of the forty-sixth ballot. Wilson had received 633 votes on the forty-fifth, with only 725½ necessary to nominate.

Senator Bankhead of Alabama quickly withdrew Underwood.

Senator Stone of Missouri, in behalf of Champ Clark, released all Clark delegates, at the same time saying Missouri would vote for him to the end. Mayor Fitzgerald of Boston then withdrew Governor Foss from consideration.

By this time it was apparent Wilson would win on the forty-sixth ballot and the convention was in an uproar, delaying the call for a long while.

Wilson gained 108 votes on the forty-third ballot, the first cast today, and the hoped-for break appeared at hand. Illinois' 58 delegates propelled the movement and gains were made also from Connecticut, Idaho, Iowa, Louisiana, Maryland, Michigan, North Carolina, Tennessee, Virginia, Wisconsin and Hawaii.

Wilson's vote was 802, a majority of the convention. It was the highest vote he had received and the vote of 329 cast for Mr. Clark was the lowest received by him during the prolonged balloting. When the result was announced the demonstration for Wilson was as enthusiastic and protracted as the weary delegates could make it.

Senator Bankhead spoke amid breathless silence. He said Underwood had entered the convention hoping to be the nominee. But his chief desire was to eradicate every vestige of sectional feeling. That had not been demonstrated by the liberal support given the Alabama candidate. He would not be a party to the defeat of any candidate.

"But I think the time has come to recognize that he cannot be nominated in this convention, nor can he be used to defeat any other candidate," Bankhead proceeded.

"Vice president?" queried a delegate from the floor.

"No," shouted back Bankhead. "He will not turn from the important duties he is performing to take such an office as vice president."

The Illinois break, which had been predicted, came on the forty-third ballot. There was a hush when the state was called. Roger Sullivan was standing in the aisle consulting the lieutenants. Finally he spoke:

"Clark, 18; Wilson, 40. Under the unit rule, the complete vote of the state, fifty-eight, must be cast for Governor Wilson."

This brought renewed cheering from the pro-Wilson contingent in the hall.

When Kentucky was called and Governor McCreary cast the state vote of twenty-six for Clark, Judge A. W. Young of Morehead, Ky., demanded whether the delegation could not change to Wilson "now that a majority of the delegates believed that he should be nominated." McCreary held that under the instructions Kentucky must vote Clark as long as his name was before the convention. Chairman James ruled that unless the poll of the state was demanded the vote should be recorded as cast. "We have been here too long now," said Young, but he declined to demand the poll.

Michigan caught the contagion and cast only two for Clark and twenty-eight for Wilson, a gain of eight for the New Jersey governor on the forty-third ballot.

New York failed to shift its position. Virginia broke, casting its solid vote of twenty-four for Wilson, giving him a majority for the first time. West Virginia broke, throwing her sixteen votes to Wilson.

The Virginia break was a factor against the anti-Wilson men, and many of them admitted that there would be little chance of preventing Wilson's nomination if another big state went over. This became almost a certainty when a moment later West Virginia cast her sixteen votes for Wilson.

Tom Heflin, congressman from Alabama, and manager of the Underwood boom, advised the Alabama delegation at 12:45 to switch to Wilson.

After the forty-third ballot some of the ultra-Clark leaders said that, while they would concede Wilson about 640 votes, that would be the limit of his vote and that he would not be nominated. They claimed to have 363 "last ditch" Clark votes on whom they could rely to hold out against Wilson all summer if necessary. To this the Wilson men replied that if the New Jersey governor received anything like 640 votes, no power on earth could keep the anti-Wilson delegates from climbing into the bandwagon. Totals forty-third ballot: Clark, 329; Wilson, 602; Underwood, 98½; Harmon, 28; Kern, 1; Foss, 27; Bryan, 1; absent, 1½.

The forty-fourth ballot was ordered at 1:01 p. m. On this ballot Colorado, one of the rock-ribbed conservative delegates, broke nine votes to Wilson. The Indiana delegation voted solidly for Wilson.

On the forty-fourth vote Colorado gave Wilson ten votes as against one heretofore cast for him. Just at this shift came Charles F. Murphy, who came down to the Missouri delegation and engaged in earnest conversation with David R. Francis, and Francis was assuring the Tammany chieftain that he would be able to hold his forces intact from now on. Indiana came solidly into the Wilson camp on this ballot.

From this time on it was a series of breaks to the Wilson column. Every new ballot swelled the total until the necessary number for a nomination was annexed by New Jersey's governor.

Dr. Woodrow Wilson was born at Staunton, Va., on Dec. 28, 1858. When Woodrow was 2 years old his father took a pastorate in Augusta, Ga., and soon became one of the most noted ministers of the South. "Tommy" Wilson, the Augusta schoolboy, is described by Prof. John T. Derby, one of his teachers, as quiet and exceptionally studious. The most important instructor of young Wilson, however, was his father.

The Wilsons moved from Augusta to Columbia, S. C., in 1870, Dr. Wilson resigning his pastorate to take the chair of pastoral and evangelistic theology in the Southern Presbyterian Theological seminary. At Columbia Tommy attended Charles Pernwell's private school. At the age of 17 he entered Davidson college at Davidson, N. C.

He did not finish the year at Davidson, for he fell ill before examinations came on and was taken to his home, now at Wilmington, N. C., where his father had taken a pastorate. Here Wilson took things comparatively easy for a year. Except for tutoring in Greek and a few other studies that he thought might be necessary for entrance to Princeton he busied himself with reading, looking up the historic points of the city and with the social life of the city.

Woodrow Wilson attained prominence among his mates in the "famous class of '79" of Princeton. No less than 42 of the 122 graduates of '79 were "honor men," having an average of 90 per cent or better for the four years' course. Wilson barely got in among them; he ranked forty-first.

Besides being a good student at Princeton, Wilson became managing editor of the college paper and was prominent in under-graduate activities.

At the age of 22 he signalized the closing of his under-graduate days at Princeton by breaking into the International Review, in its issue of August, 1879, with an article entitled "Cabinet Government in the United States." The article contrasted British and American systems of government, pointing out advantages in the British.

In the fall of 1878 Wilson took up the law course at the University of Virginia, where he indulged in a long, drooping moustache and in membership in the glee club. "She Sleeps, My Lady Sleeps," is shown by old programs of university concerts to have been one of Wilson's tenor solos.

In May, 1882, he carried his law diploma and an oratorical prize to Atlanta, Ga., where he opened an office for the practice of law. The office, however, did not prosper, and after 18 leisurely months he gave up. The Atlanta experiment, however, was far from eventless. Although litigants gave him nothing to do, he was not idle. He improved his time by securing the promise of Miss Ellen Louise Axson to be his wife. The Axons were a prominent Georgia lowlands family. The young couple were married in 1875.

In the fall of 1885 Mr. Wilson began teaching political economy to the girls of Bryn Mawr. From this institution he went to Wesleyan university, where he remained until called to Princeton in 1890 to occupy the chair of jurisprudence and politics. In 1902 he was elected president of Princeton.

In May, 1910, the graduate college of Princeton university became the legatee of a $2,000,000 estate, which could not be accepted without sacrificing Wilson's policies. The money was accepted. The president's resignation did not come, however, until after the New Jersey state Democratic convention on Sept. 15, 1912, had nominated him for the governorship. In the following November New Jersey went Democratic for the first time since 1892 and elected Wilson by a large majority.

President Wilson made it clear at the start that conditions at the university were to be changed, and, whether for better or for worse, to be changed radically. He stated that colleges needed to be revolutionized, and went so far as to say he would endeavor "to graduate students as unlike their fathers as possible."

THOMAS R. MARSHALL.

His policies kept him in almost continuous conflict with the university trustees and professors. In fact, the bitterest controversies in the institution's history marked his term. Wilson's friends say it was a conflict between a Progressive and Democratic president and the forces of privilege and aristocracy.

The earliest recorded mention of Woodrow Wilson as a presidental possibility is in the form of a letter written by some one in Indianapolis to the News of that city at the time of Wilson's inauguration as president of Princeton. This faint boom was revived on Feb. 3, 1906, at the Lotus club, New York, where Mr. Wilson was the guest of honor. On that occasion Col. George Harvey mentioned him as a possible candidate for the presidential nomination.

Colonel Harvey's magazine, Harper's Weekly, for a time gave ardent support to Wilson's campaign for the nomination; but at the beginning of 1912 this support was withdrawn.

Baltimore, Md. — For president Governor Woodrow Wilson of New Jersey.

For vice president, Governor Thomas R. Marshall of Indiana.

The nomination of Governor Marshall for vice president came as something of a surprise for when the night's balloting for vice president began it seemed that the Bryan-Wilson contingent in the convention had definitely settled upon Governor John E. Burke of North Dakota.

There was not much of a fight, however, and when two ballots disclosed Marshall easily in the lead, Governor Burke's name was withdrawn and Marshall was proclaimed the nominee by acclamation. A minute later the convention had adjourned sine die.

The delegates, worn and weary, 1:58 a. m., Wednesday. vention hall singing and happy to be started for home.

Mr. Bryan had announced his intention of introducing a resolution in effect discharging the national committee from conduct of the coming campaign and allowing Governor Wilson to conduct his own campaign.

Colonel Bryan delivered what he called his "valedictory" and, in happy vein, turned over the mantle of his former leadership as a presidential candidate to Governor Wilson.

He pledged himself to the full sup- made their way out of the big con- ended by urging that either Governor Burke or Senator George Chamberlain of Oregon, be nominated for vice president. The Nebraskan was understood port of the presidential nominee and particularly to favor Governor Burke as a type of the modern Progressive.

When, after the first ballot someone moved to make the nomination of Marshall unanimous, Mr. Bryan started for the stage to make a statement. The motion was withdrawn before he could speak. When the motion was renewed after the second ballot, Mr. Bryan did not protest.

The platform hewed out in committee several days ago, and warmly with a whoop.

Many of the delegates went directly from the convention hall to special trains. Practically all will have left town within a few hours.

Prominently mentioned for the vice presidency were: Governor Marshall, of Indiana; Governor Burke of North Dakota, Representative Henry of Texas, and Senator Kern of Indiana.

Baltimore, Md. — William F. McCombs of New York, 35 years old, a lawyer and graduate of Princeton and Harvard, will in all probability be chosen as chairman of the Democratic national committee or as chairman of the campaign committee of Woodrow Wilson.

Mr. McCombs, who managed the pre-nomination campaign for Governor Wilson, has been in Baltimore since the convention began and learned that he is Governor Wilson's choice as the man who should direct the workers from now until election day.

W. F. McCOMBS.

Mr. McCombs went to New York and began the practice of law. He had a great admiration for Woodrow Wilson. When Wilson was nominated for Governor of New Jersey, McCombs sent him a telegram congratulating him on his nomination and said: "You will be elected and you will be the next president of the United States."

George Foster Peabody, former treasurer of the Democratic national committee, strongly indorsed Mr. McCombs for vice president in a statement.

Veteran Indian Fighter Passes.

Cedar Rapids, Iowa. — Joseph McSeathon, war scout and veteran Indian fighter, died here, aged 70 years. McSeathon was with General Custer and General Sheridan in many battles.

Grain Shippers Benefit.

Washington, D. C. — The interstate commerce commission extended the territory in which allowances may be paid by railroads to shippers for elevation of grain so as to include not only the Missouri river cities, but grain markets on the Ohio and Mississippi rivers on the Great lakes and at Chicago. One-fourth a cent a bushel was held to be a fair compensation and for both transportation elevation and commercial elevation the compensation should be three-fourths of a cent.

Plenty of Potatoes.

Duluth. — Northeastern Minnesota will have the biggest yield of potatoes in years, according to Superintendent A. J. McGuire of the Northeast experimental farm at Grand Rapids. It will average about 275 bushels per acre. Wheat and oats will go 35 to 55 bushels respectively, while corn is rather backward, owing to the lack of real warm weather. Another factor that is retarding corn is the lack of rain but farmers are of the opinion that if rain falls this week, the yield will be as large as usual.

Hard to Find Names.

Minneapolis. — Naming towns that spring up on the trail of a newly built railroad seems to be as difficult a proposition as naming the babies when they come in a bunch or making a final choice at a national convention when there are several candidates. At least this is the experience of officials of the Soo line, who have had to find names for 16 "baby" cities that have sprung into existence along the Soo new branch line from Drake to Fordville, N. D.

WAGES RAISED A TENTH.

Street Railway Employees of Duluth Also to Have New Clubhouse.

Duluth.—Duluth street railway employees have been granted a raise in pay of 10 per cent. Several weeks ago the men threatened to strike because of alleged poor pay and poor quarters at the car barns. The company first announced it would build a clubhouse for the men, and announced to the committee a raise in wages of 10 per cent.

Fragments of Man on Train.

Winona. — Most of the skin and a portion of the chest of an unknown man's body about 55 years old, was brought into Winona by the northbound fast mail train on the Milwaukee road and subsequent search showed fragments of the body dropped beside the track from River Junction to Winona. Fragments brought here were hanging on a bolt of the truck of the car. One slip of paper found in the vest read, "Meal to Mr. Foster." other gave the address of Dr. Hurd of Minneapolis.

TARIFF REFORM IS DEMOCRATIC CREED

Leading Plank of Platform Adopted by Baltimore Convention.

FAVORS FIGHT ON TRUSTS

Action of Republican Administration in Compromising With Standard Oil and Tobacco Combines Condemned—Views on Other Subjects.

Following are the principal planks of the platform adopted by the Democratic national convention at Baltimore.

The Tariff Reform.

"We declare it to be a fundamental principle of the Democratic party that the federal government under the Constitution has no right or power to impose or collect tariff duties except for the purpose of revenue and we demand that the collection of such taxes shall be limited to the necessities of government honestly and economically administered.

"The high Republican tariff is the principal cause of the unequal distribution of wealth; it is a system of taxation which makes the rich richer and the poor poorer; under its operations the American farmer and laboring man are the chief sufferers; it raises the cost of the necessaries of life to them, but does not protect their product or wages.

"We favor the immediate downward revision of the existing high, and in many cases, prohibitive tariff duties, insisting that material reductions be speedily made upon the necessaries of life. Articles entering into competition with trust controlled products and articles of American manufacture where sold abroad more cheaply than at home could be put upon the free list.

"We denounce the action of President Taft in vetoing the bills to reduce the tariff in the cotton, woolen, metals and chemicals schedules and the farmers free list bills, all of which was designed to give immediate relief to the masses from the exactions of the trusts.

"The Republican party, while promising tariff revision, has shown by its tariff legislation that such revision is not to be in the people's interests and having been faithless to its pledges of 1908 it should no longer enjoy the confidence of the nation.

High Cost of Living.

"The high cost of living is a serious problem in every American home. The Republican party in its platform attempts to escape from responsibility for present conditions by denying that they are due to a protective tariff. We take issue with them on this subject and charge that excessive prices result in a large measure from the high tariff laws enacted and maintained by the Republican party, and from trusts and commercial conspirators fostered and encouraged by such laws, and we assert that no substantial relief can be secured for the people until import duties on the necessaries of life are materially reduced, and those criminal conspiracies broken up.

Anti-Trust Law.

"A private monopoly is indefensible and intolerable. We therefore favor the vigorous enforcement of the criminal as well as the civil law against trusts and trust officials, and demand enactment of such additional legislation as may be necessary to make it impossible for a private monopoly to exist in the United States.

"We condemn the action of the Republican administration in compromising with the Standard Oil Company and the tobacco trust and its failure to invoke the criminal provisions of the anti-trust law against the officers of those corporations after the court had declared that from the undisputed facts in the record they had violated the criminal provisions of the law.

"We regret that Sherman anti-trust law has received a judicial construction depriving it of much of its efficacy, and we favor the enactment of legislation which will restore to the statute the strength of which it has been deprived by such interpretation.

Income Tax and Popular Election of Senators.

"We congratulate the country upon the triumph of two important reforms demanded in the last national platform, namely, the amendment of the federal constitution authorizing an income tax and the amendment providing for the popular election of senators, and we call upon the people of all the states to rally to the support of the pending propositions and secure their ratification.

"We note with gratification the unanimous sentiment in favor of publicity before the election of campaign contributions—a measure demanded in our national platform of 1908 and at that time opposed by the Republican party, and we commend the Democratic House of Representatives for extending the doctrine of publicity to recommendations, verbal and written, upon which presidential appointments are made, to the ownership and control of newspapers and to the expenditures made by and in behalf of those who aspire to presidential nominations and we point for additional justification for this legislation to the enormous expenditures of money in behalf of the president and his predecessor in the recent contest for the Republican nomination for president.

Presidential Primaries.

"The movement towards more popular government should be promoted through legislation in each state which will permit the expression of the preference of the electors for national candidates at presidential primaries.

"We direct that the national committee incorporate in the call for the next nominating convention a requirement that all expressions of preference for presidential candidates shall be given and the selection of delegates and alternates be through a primary election conducted by the party organization in each state where such expression and election are not provided for by state law.

Term of President.

"We favor a single presidential term, and to the end urge the adoption of an amendment to the constitution making the president of the United States ineligible to re-election, and we pledge the candidate of this convention to this principle.

Railroads, Express Companies, Telegraph and Telephone Lines.

"We favor the efficient supervision and rate regulation of railroads, express companies, telegraph and telephone lines engaged in interstate commerce. To this end we recommend the valuation of railroads, express companies, telegraph and telephone lines by the interstate commerce commission, such valuation to take into consideration the physical value of the property, the original cost, the cost of reproduction, and any element of value that will render the valuation fair and just.

Banking Legislation.

"We oppose the so-called Aldrich bill or the establishment of a central bank, and we believe the people of the country will be largely freed from panics and consequent un-employment and business depression by such a systematic revision of our banking laws as will render temporary relief in localities where such relief is needed, with protection from control or domination by what is known as the money trust.

Parcels Post and Rural Delivery.

"We favor the establishment of a parcels post or postal express, and also the extension of the rural delivery system as rapidly as practicable.

The campaign contributions plank pledges the party to the enactment of a law prohibiting any corporation from contributing to a campaign fund. It also limits individual contributions to a "reasonable maximum."

The Democratic congress is heartily commended for its long list of laws for the benefit of the people after a generation of unlimited power by the Republican party. The next plank arraigns the Republican party for waste of "the money wrung from the people by oppressive taxation."

A plank on rural credits is of importance. It is recommended that an investigation of agricultural credit societies in foreign countries be made looking toward devising a suitable system for the United States. A waterways plank provides for federal control of the Mississippi and other waterways. The plan is to maintain an average depth on the big river so it will be navigable, and construct docks to prevent further floods. This plank also favors draining of all swamp lands.

The platform favors post roads. It reaffirms its declarations in the 1908 platform in regard to labor. It holds there should be a modification of the injunctional laws.

It also recommends a department of labor with a cabinet officer.

The conservation plank is also of importance and holds that conservation and development should proceed for the benefit of all the people. Immediate action is favored to make available the coal deposits of Alaska.

A pure food and public health plank declares for the union and strengthening of the various governmental agencies relating to pure food, quarantine, vital statistics and human health. This department should be administered without partiality or discrimination in favor of or against any school of medicine. The civil service law should be honestly and rigidly enforced. Legislation is favored to promote law reform. The "policy of imperialism" in the Philippines is denounced. It favors the declaration of the independence of these islands. Arizona and New Mexico are welcomed to the sisterhood of states.

The Old-Fashioned Fire.

Could anything be more refreshing than the smell of the old-fashioned wood fire in late spring or early autumn? There is something grimy in the reek of coal, and the odor of gas is nauseating. Modern inventions may have brought their "conveniences," but a staid old senator who lately "passed beyond," insisted that when he [illegible] wood fire in the cook stove and sit around as in his old boyhood days on the farm. "What memories it recalls," he would say, "to hear the crackle of the wood and sniff the smoke that seems to be purifying rather than oppressive."—"Affairs and Folks," Joe Mitchell Chapple, in Joe Chapple's News Letter.

NEW PARTY BARRED

ATTORNEY GENERAL RULES THAT LAW PREVENTS NOMINATIONS AT ELECTION.

MUST FILE PETITIONS.

Provisions of the New Statute Are Construed by State's Legal Advisor, Lyndon A. Smith.

Minneapolis. — Attorney General Lyndon A. Smith gave out an opinion holding that the proposed third party will have no legal standing in the September primary election. It follows from his opinion that if the party is organized it will have to nominate its candidates for presidential elector or for any other offices by petition, after the primary, and no one who votes in the primary will be eligible to sign the petitions.

The opinion was given out in response to many informal requests as to the legal status of a new party. It is as follows:

"A political party, as that term is used in the primary election law, is one which has maintained in the district or territorial division in question a party organized and preserved candidates at three or more biennial elections within the preceding ten years. This rule is modified only as to counties by the clause which permits a number equal to 10 per cent or more of the members of a party not qualified to nominate county officers at a primary election to present a petition to the county auditor for a place on the primary election ballot of said county.

"It follows that any party now being formed cannot nominate its candidates at the coming primary election. I am confirmed in this opinion, that a group of persons desiring to form a new party must have their candidates put on the election ballot by certificates of voters, by the language of the clause which reads as follows: 'But nothing herein shall prevent the nomination of candidates by groups of individuals or so-called political parties which cannot be recognized as such, by a certificate of voters to the number hereinafter specified.' It is also to be noted that any person filing for the nomination at the primaries must swear 'that he affiliated with such party at the last general election.' If there had been no such party at that time he could not so qualify. The voter at a primary, if challenged, must swear that he generally supported the candidates of that party at the last election and that he intends to support that party at the election next ensuing. So without either candidates or voters qualified to participate, any party now forming has no place in the coming primary election.

"The clause of the election law reading, 'Candidates for office shall be chosen at such primary election by voters of the several political parties, and not otherwise,' means the same as though the word 'respective' was used in the place of the word 'several,' and that it forbids the voters of one party taking part in the choice at a primary of another party in the selection of its candidates."

DUAL LIFE REVEALED.

McIntosh Says He Was Robber and Society Man at 18.

Minneapolis.—Desire to "travel with the high rollers" was one of the motives which led four boys, thrown together for the most part in pool halls, to form the daring bandit quartet that terrorized Minneapolis and committed many crimes, according to the story told by Raymond McIntosh, 18-year-old leader of the band, in the county jail after he and each of his three companions had been held to the grand jury under $20,000 bail each, charged with holding up the automobile of Edmund C. Bates on Superior boulevard the night of June 22. Guarded by a dozen detectives, led by Assistant Chief of Police George Riviere, the youths had appeared before Municipal Judge E. A. Montgomery and waived examination.

It was in a pool hall that he met Clarence Spencer and made him a member of the band, and it was in other pool halls that he again met Francis McCarthy, whom he had known before as a football player, and agreed to admit him as a member, McIntosh said.

FARMER A SUICIDE.

Despondent Because He Couldn't Support Family.

Tower. — Despondent over poor health and unable to work to support his family in the Peyla district south of town, prompted Jack Silverbeck, a farmer, to shoot himself with a rifle while his family was working in the field. Deputy Coroner R. L. Burns pronounced it a case of suicide and an inquest not necessary.

Two Others Also Injured When Auto Turns Over.

Duluth, July .—Life was instantly crushed from the bodies of Mrs. William White of Duluth, Miss Gladys Richards of Bridgeport, Conn., and Langdon Maddigan of Duluth, the last named a chauffeur, at about midnight on a country pike near Duluth, when a touring car in which they were returning home, skidded from the road and overturned, pinioning its occupants beneath.

William White, Jr., was seriously injured about the back and is at a local hospital.

Miss Nannie Turrish, daughter of Henry C. Turrish, a lumberman, was severely shocked and lay apparently lifeless at the roadside until carried to a nearby farmhouse, where she was resuscitated.

Charles W. Fitzgerald, the sixth member of the party, was thrown clear of the wreckage and escaped without injury. Gaining his feet, he found his efforts to move the heavy automobile fruitless, and ran along the road to a farm and secured four men, who pried the car from the bodies. The women and the chauffeur were dead.

The point at which the tragedy occurred is about four miles from Pike lake. The pike descends in a gentle sweep from higher ground to an abrupt turn. When the car arrived at the curve it was traveling at about ten miles an hour. The surface of the road slopes to the left with a narrow ditch at the base. The heavy car skidded from the track and when the front wheels struck the ditch the equipage pirouetted into the air and landed bottomside up.

The party had spent the afternoon and evening as guests of Miss Turrish and Charles Fitzgerald at the latter's cottage at Pike lake. The car is the property of Henry C. Turrish.

The Dead.

Miss Gladys Richardson was 20 years old. She was the guest of Miss Turrish and had been at her home several days.

Mrs. White was about 55 years old. She was the wife of William White, a prominent retired merchant.

Langford Maddigan was the son of Mrs. Nellie Maddigan, manager of a local employment office.

3RD PARTY NOT NEEDED.

Candidate for Governor Says Democratic Nominee Ends Need.

Minneapolis. — E. T. Young, candidate for governor of Minnesota, issued a statement declaring he was opposed to the third party. He asserted that Mr. Wilson represented and advocated practically all the principles Col. Roosevelt stood for; that the majority of the members of the Republican party are Progressives and are entitled to vote for a Progressive; that the opportunity to vote for a Progressive presents itself in the nomination of Woodrow Wilson and that under the circumstances a third party is not justifiable.

Mr. Young said he believed a third party, headed by Col. Roosevelt or some other Progressive would be fatal to the Progressive cause, for the reason that it would split the Progressive vote to such an extent that Mr. Taft would be elected. Mr. Young took the position that Tammany hall would desert Wilson and that all the conservative Democrats would follow its lead.

Mr. Young was active in the late state Republican convention as an uncompromising Roosevelt man.

WOULD BE COUNTY SEAT.

Hopes to Form New County From Todd, Morrison and Cass.

Staples. — A campaign has been launched for the purpose of making Staples a county seat. Staples is in the northern part of Todd county and so far from Long Prairie, the county seat, that many voters have expressed their desire for a division.

The proposed new county has not been mapped out completely, but it is the sentiment of the people that it be composed of the northern four or five townships surrounding Staples, part of the northern townships of Morrison county and part of the southern townships of Cass county.

The business men have sent committees to various parts of the proposed county, and so far the plan has met with approval. They will contribute to pay the expense of the preliminary campaign and boundaries will be definitely fixed in a few weeks.

Flour Boats to Cruise Again.

Minneapolis.—The decision of the interstate commerce commission in favor of Minneapolis in the fight of the Flour City Steamship line against Eastern railroads signifies a new birth for the transportation company, according to W. F. Trickett, traffic director of the Civic and Commerce association. He said the steamship line would resume operation, possibly this year. Nothing definite can be decided until a copy of the commission's decision is received.

NORTHWEST GRAIN

RAIN IS GENERAL OVER MINNESOTA AND THE DAKOTAS, BRING NEEDED MOISTURE.

FARMERS ARE JUBILANT

Thomas Cooper Says Downpour Is Worth Millions and Came Just at Right Time—Fields Are Refreshed.

Moorhead.—After a week of blistering weather, in which the thermometer registered record temperature of 95 in the shade and above every day, the Red river valley and North Dakota got its first rain in nearly two weeks. Farmers are jubilant.

Locally everything is drenched. More than an inch and a half of rain has fallen already, according to the government reading. The storm centered over Moorhead and sections five miles south of the city received no rain.

Showers have fallen over practically every section in North Dakota. The northern half of the Red river valley received only a quarter of an inch and showers in other sections of the state aggregated from one-tenth to one-half of an inch. The weather bureau predicts more unsettled weather and showers. The barometer is unsteady indicating a coming storm, and Bismarck on "the slope" reports rain there.

Thomas Cooper, secretary of the North Dakota Better Farming association says of the rain and present conditions:

"We have every reason for optimism; prospects are brighter than ever. Sunday I completed a trip through the state. In the western part of the state I found many fields, poorly prepared, where moisture was needed. Today's rain will be of great benefit to that section. Crops could have gone four or five days longer without rain before any considerable damage would have been done, even in the face of the hot weather. Rain was very much needed over the central and northern sections of the state. In the Red river valley only the lighter fields showed any need for rain. We cannot estimate the value of the rain; it came just at the right time."

SENSATION IN TRIAL.

Murder Case Defendent at Red Wing Tries to Attack a Witness.

Red Wing.—A sensation was created at the trial of Eugene Artz, on the charge of plotting the murders of Mr. and Mrs. Anton Schill, when Jake Doeffler told the story implicating his brother-in-law. Telling of the conversation he and Artz had in the stone quarry, Doeffler said:

"Artz told me that Boatman wanted me to work for him. I told him I did not want to work for any one, but intended to buy a farm in Wisconsin. Eugene said to me: 'Have you got the money?' I answered, 'No, I'm going to be married to Ida Wohler.' Artz then said she may give you the money. If she doesn't there is an old couple living near here who have a farm and money. Artz told me we could get it. He said, 'You take the farm stuff, I will take the money. He told me to keep still about it. Artz asked me if I had the revolver, but said the rifle would do."

At this point Artz cried out: "What! and I your brother-in-law. This is too much,' and he broke into tears. Then he made a sudden move to attack his brother-in-law in the witness stand, but was restrained by a deputy. Mrs. Artz, sitting besides her husband, wept bitterly.

CASS LAKE CLUB FORMED

Mass Meeting Called to Organize for Road Improvement.

Cass Lake.—Cass Lake is to have a good roads club. Business men have decided to issue a call for a mass meeting on Monday evening to form a permanent organization. A fund of $100 has been subscribed to put the road around picturesque Pike bay and to Bena in repair.

The annual meeting and election of officers of the Cass Lake fire department and relief association was held and resulted in the election of the following: Fire department, A. F. Ittner, chief; Dan Lilly, first assistant; P. J. Keating, second; D. V. Wardner, secretary, and H. W. Dugas, treasurer. Relief association, C. F. Nelson, president; James Leary, vice president; D. V. REGULATING THE STOMACH

That Important Organ Works According to the Quality of the Blood That Is Furnished to It.

There is the most intimate relation between the condition of the blood and the activity of the stomach. The blood depends upon the stomach for a large part of its nourishment; while every act of digestion, from the time the food enters the stomach until it is digested and assimilated by the blood, needs plenty of pure, well-oxidized blood. The stomach works only according to the quality of the blood.

The most common cause of indigestion is anæmia, or lack of blood. Indeed there is not a single disturbance of the health of the body nor any form of exhaustion or lowered vitality, that may not lead to stomach trouble. Disordered blood is the one common cause of indigestion. Thin, impure blood weakens the muscles of the stomach and lessens the product of the glands which furnish the digestive fluids.

Nothing will more promptly cure indigestion than plenty of pure, well-oxidized blood. Dr. Williams' Pink Pills for Pale People increase the red corpuscles, the oxygen-carriers of the blood, until the blood is rich and red. A thorough trial of these pills gives a hearty appetite, perfect digestion, strength and health.

Mrs. Emma M. Mayno, of No. 635 Second avenue, Clinton, Iowa, says: "I had just worked myself out bringing up a family of five children and, while in this run-down condition, I took sick with some kind of stomach trouble. I doctored with several physicians and saw a specialist in Chicago but received little help. I could not eat anything with relish and could not sleep. I would have deathly sick spells and would vomit. I had terrible headaches and dizzy spells. I got very thin and my friends thought I was going into consumption. I doctored for a year or so without help. While visiting a niece she told me that she took Dr. Williams' Pink Pills for Pale People, so I tried them. They soon helped me and a few boxes entirely cured me."

Dr. Williams' Pink Pills are sold by all druggists, or will be sent, postpaid, on receipt of price, 50c. per box; six boxes for $2.50, by the Dr. Williams Medicine Co., Schenectady, N. Y.

Springs in Their Brains.

Two Frenchmen, in visiting an art gallery, stopped to admire a painting by an American. The artist happened to be in the gallery and in broken English one of the Frenchmen asked: "How did monsieur ever catch such a wonderful picture?"

"O," replied the artist, with a faraway look, "that painting was an offspring of my brain."

The other Frenchman was greatly interested and asked his friend what that American had said.

"I can hardly explain," whispered the first Frenchman excitedly; "he said ze picture was one spring off of his brain. Ees eet any wonder zat ze Americans act queerly when they have springs on their brains?"

THE SUNBEAM.

BY W. G. HUNT.

Woodrow Wilson, of New Jersey the leader of the progressive Democrats is their nominee for president, and the party will go into the campaign united against a broken up and a disrupted mob that forced the nomination of a man on to the Republican party, that the people will not vote for.

All offers of the furnishing of free political plate by the plate houses is promptly turned down at this office. That has been one of the fat pickings for the city politicians to get good big pay for booming candidates for offices through the free use of the "County Suckers", sometimes called editors, papers. But it don't go at this office anymore, as we always look for the woodchuck in the wood pile as soon as we get an offer of free plate. Turn them down brethren of the country press, for you are as much entitled to pay for your work as the city plate house editor. If they want their political matter published for your readers let them talk business, of so much per column. If all country editors will adhere to this rule they will receive a good increase to their revenue, instead of an order from the plate houses to return all unused plate.

The Socialist party will be the gainers largely, by the split in the republican party, as it is difficult to tell where the large masses of the voters will turn who do not propose to have Taft pushed onto them. That a new party will come into any prominence we very much doubt, and there is now a prospect that it will be abanded since Woodrow Wilson is the progressive nominee of the democratic party. However all indications point to the one fact, and that is that Taft will be the worst defeated man that has run for president since Horace Greely ran against Grant. We would say this if he had the indorsment of the old live democrats as it takes votes to elect a president and Taft has not got them behind him, for the people are firmly convinced that he is not the man for president and they wont vote for him.

The County Socialist organization met at Theif River Falls and nominated a full set of county officers expecting register of deeds which they intended to fill later. The following are the candidates: Peter Beckon, of Theif River Falls, Auditor; Peter H. Thoreson, of High Landing, Treasurer; Ben Christianson, of Thief River Falls, Clerk of Courts; W. O. Long, of North, Sheriff; O. A. Naplin, Thief River Falls, County Attorney; P. L. Viataunt, Thief River Falls, Coroner; Irving E. Quist, Thief River Falls, Surveyor; George L. Nettleson, Roxbury, was reccommenced for Judge of Probate and Ole Landro, of Thief River Falls, for the office of Court Commissioner, For Supervisors, Peter C. Wold received the nomination in the first; second, ommited; Olof Larson, third; Erick Kittleson, fourth and George Leimers fifth.

Sam Gordon by his boldness in denouncing the methods of Tafts nomination will gain strength in the ranks of the progressive Republicans of this state, as a man who has the courage to come out and denounce a wrong in his own party is just about the kind of man that we need for governor of this state, as we always did hate a sneak that was anything to get office. Eberhart is the man to lead Tafts campaign in this state and the people can put the two of them over the dump by making one trip to election.

We understand that the lumber company are putting in a dam at the outlet of Red Lake so as to close off the water at anytime. Of course there is no use to make make any complaint about it under that Engineers outfit at St. Paul as the lumber company and not the government are in complete control of this river, but they will pass out of power with the passing of Taft, which event takes place the 4th of next March.

Thief River Falls are to have a now flax fiber factory. The proposition as subbmitted to the citizens of that place last week will undoubtly be accepted and the mill will be built this season. Although we up this way would have quite a distance to market yet with the improved methods of baling flax straw could be delivered at the mill at a profit and would add much to the income of our farmers flax crop. The citizens of Thief River Falls are beginning to see the advantages of pushing enterprises for the benefit of the farmers.

We understand that the lumber company are putting a dam at the outlet of Red Lake so as to close off the water at anytime. Of course there is no use to make any complaint about it under that Engineers Outfit at St Paul as the lomber company and not the government are in complete control of this river, but they will pass out of power with the passing of Taft. Which event takes place the 4th, of next March.

Boiling Potatoes.

There is a simple way to prevent potatoes from burning and sticking to the bottom of the pot. An inverted pie pan placed in the bottom of the pot avoids scorching potatoes. The water and empty space beneath the pan save the potatoes. This also makes the work of cleaning pots easier, as no adhering parts of potatoes are left to be scoured out.

At the annual school meeting will be the time to talk over the question of having a first grade school in your district. LITTLE LADY BOUNTIFUL

By TEMPLE BAILEY

(Copyright, 1912, by Associated Literary Press.)

In the top of the tall tenement Tom Stevens recklessly lighted both gas burners.

"I might as well be warm once," he murmured, and settled back in his uncomfortable chair to pass another day in pain and loneliness.

It is bad enough to be sick, even in the midst of luxury, but to be sick and poor, that is enough to make a man groan and writhe. Tom Stevens, alone in the big city, too proud to write back home and tell of his hard luck, looked at the gray skies and the gay streets and wished he were dead.

And just then he heard the rustle of paper, and, looking toward the door, he saw that a note had been slipped under it.

Painfully he crossed the room, and painfully he returned to his big chair. Then he opened the sheet of paper. Across the top was painted a wreath of tiny rosebuds, and underneath was the verse:

There is ever a song somewhere, my dear,
Though the skies above be dark and drear;
There is ever a song that our hearts shall hear,
There is ever a song somewhere, my dear,
There is ever a song somewhere.

As he read Tom felt as if the sun were shining and the birds singing on a June day. Who had thought of him in his loneliness? Why, it was better than food and drink—better than fire and warmth.

"It's a girl's handwriting," he said to himself. He felt as if he wanted to get right up and hunt for her, but when he tried to move he sank back with a groan, and the little neighborhood doctor, coming in, cautioned him.

The next morning the janitor's wife brought him his meager meal. It was sloppy and badly cooked and Tom turned from it with a sigh. So the janitor's wife carried the tray, but left a crack in the door.

And it was through this crack an hour later, was slipped a tiny tray. On it was a steaming cup of coffee, two slices of hot toast, and a soft boiled egg.

Tom, making for the door, threw it wide open and faced an empty hallway. He dragged himself to the apartment across the way and knocked. The janitor, passing through the hall, asked curiously: "Did you want any help, sir?"

"Who lives in there?" Tom demanded.

"An old man and his wife," said the janitor. "And he works and she works."

Tom sighed and went back to find on the tray a little note:

Little Tommy Tucker sings for his supper,
What shall he sing for, white bread and butter.

Tom ate the toast and the egg, drank the coffee and laid the note carefully away in his bill book with the one which had come the day before.

"Just wait till I'm well," he murmured.

He resolved that he would watch the door and lie in wait.

"But I wonder—when she'll come," was his eager thought.

[illegible] passed, and the night was well advanced, when Tom, still lying awake, heard in the hall a little sound. He sat up and listened, and suddenly he was aware of a light shining under the door. Gathering his dressing gown about him, he rose from his couch, opened the door and looked out. On the threshold was a lighted candle in an old-fashioned candlestick. Tied to the handle was a card, and on the card was written:

"How far that little candle throws his beams so shines a good deed in a naughty world."

Tom went back to bed, and laboriously made his stiff fingers pen his sentiments:

"Dear Lady Bountiful: I can't write poetry, but I can say in plain, everyday words how grateful I am. And how I wish—but, you know what I wish—that Fate will not be unkind and that—some day—when you will it—that I may see you, and tell you what is not easy to say adequately on paper."

He signed it "Tommy Tucker," and put it in the hall and shut the door. And when an hour later he opened the door the note was gone.

"Aha," said Tom to himself, "she's not far away, and that's something to think about."

After a time there came a quick "tap, tap," and Tom got out of his chair in a hurry, but by the time he reached the door the hall was empty, but there was a note lying waiting for him.

It said: "I am going to send you a grandmother—you must be nice to her for my sake."

Tom whistled. "Well, of all things," he ejaculated.

At six precisely a little, gray-haired lady bustled in.

"Gracious!" she said, without waiting for formalities, "you poor boy. This won't do at all. You ought to be in bed, covered up with hot water bags and hot broths and, and—"

"But, really, I can't," Tom stammered.

[illegible]

[illegible] heat some water, and when I come back I'll tuck you up comfortably, and take care of you until you are well."

"But," Tom gasped, "I can't—"

"Nonsense," said the little lady again, "you do just as I say. I'm used to bossing boys."

An hour later Tom, tucked up in bed with hot water bags to the right of him, and hot water bags to the left of him, and with his appetite satisfied by the most delicious broth that he had ever tasted, inquired meekly of his "grandmother":

"How did you know I was ill?"

She looked at him sharply over her spectacles. "A little bird told me," she declared.

He was sick two weeks, and every day there came to him dainty notes in the graceful feminine script. They came by mail now, and there was the postmark of a distant city.

Tom had learned by this time that his "grandmother" lived on the opposite side of the hall. When he was strong enough he went into her plain apartment, and then he wondered where the luxuries which she had furnished him during his illness had been obtained, for in these rooms there was no sign of affluence, yet there had been for him all the delicacies that tempt the appetite of an invalid.

"Now, grandmother," he said one morning, when he was dressed and ready to take his first outing. "We've got to have an understanding. It must have taxed you a lot to get all those good things for me, and as soon as I can get work I'm going to pay you back. But I can't ever repay you for the other things—your sympathy and kindness.

The little woman patted his big hand. "There," she said, "don't you worry about it. It hasn't cost me a penny—there was a fairy godmother who met all the bills."

But she would not tell him another word.

The next day Tom began to look for work. He had been badly placed in his first position. He felt himself equal to something better.

One day he found it—a bigger thing than he had hoped for—with an excellent salary attached.

Then he went back to the little "grandmother." "I want to find my fairy godmother," he said, "and you know where she is."

"I don't," said the lady flatly.

"Oh, come now."

"I don't," was the decided answer, "but I can tell you who she is. She is my niece, and when she was twenty-one she came into a nice little sum of money, and she made up her mind that she would spend it on having a good time. But she's a funny child, and she didn't call it a good time to go to the shows and things; she just wanted to spend her money on helping other people. And one day she heard you cough, and when your door was open she peeped in, and she just couldn't bear to think of your being so lonesome, and so she planned the little surprises, and one day she said, 'Now, auntie, he needs more attention than I can give him, and you just do all you can, and I will provide the money.' And she has, and then when you began to want to know her, she got scared and went home."

"Where is her home?" Tom demanded.

"She ain't there," said the little lady. "She's gone to work. You see, her money didn't last long, when she spent it that way. But she said she had the time of her life."

"What is her work?"

"She's a stenographer," said the little lady.

Tom's heart leaped. Then at least she was not a rich girl, as he had feared. How could he then have dared to woo her!

"If you know her home address, you give it to me," he said, and reluctantly the aunt gave it to him, and that night he took a train and started on his quest.

He found her, for fate was kind to him. And she was dear and sweet, as he had dreamed she might be.

He brought a letter of introduction from the aunt.

"But I don't really need it, you know," he said.

"No," her cheeks were pink; "did you—did you think I was very forward?"

"I thought you were—an angel," Tom blurted out.

But he did not tell her then all that was in his heart, for time was needed for the wooing and the winning.

Short Kings and Tall Queens.

Many European monarchs are of shorter stature than their queens. George V. is several inches shorter than Queen Mary. The German empress is slightly taller than the kaiser; and it is alleged that when they are being photographed together William sees that the queen takes a seat while he himself stands.

The czar of all Russias is by no means as tall as his consort, and Alfonso of Spain is said to be a head shorter than Queen Victoria Eugenie. The King of Italy hardly reaches to the shoulders of his Montenegrin wife. The queen of Denmark too, is taller than her husband.

Exceptions are the king of Norway and the king of the Belgians. The latter, six feet two inches in height, is the tallest ruler in Europe.—Harper's Weekly.

ROCK-EATING CATTLE

by E. S. Cameron

SEEKING THE BRAKES BEFORE A STORM

BONE-CHEWING is a frequent cause of death among ranch cattle, which also chew the shed antlers of mule deer. The bones usually become firmly fixed in the teeth of the lower jaw, and the poor brutes wander about until they die of starvation. The late Henry Evans, who made systematic search for dead deer during his long lease of Jura Forest, found bone-chewing to be a not uncommon cause of death; but the victims were mostly stags, and his own comment was: "Probably, as in the human species, females are more dexterous than males." Fortunately, numbers of cattle are relieved in time, and my neighbor (Lund) saved from death a famished cow, which had mistaken a piece of tough cottonwood root for a bone. It was wedged transversely in her mouth (against the jawbone on one side, but firmly embedded in the cheek flesh of the other) and was removed with difficulty after the animal had been "roped" and thrown. I think, however, that accidents of any kind arising from the bone-chewing habit, whether to deer or cattle, are transcended by the remarkable appetite for rock displayed by some of the cattle on a well-known Montana ranch. This rock-swallowing propensity (which is operative only in winter) is almost invariably fatal, and but very few cases have recovered, either naturally or when medicinally treated. The phenomenon was first observed on March 4, 1903, when the senior of two brothers (Archdale) had ridden out to look over his herd. To his consternation he found the bodies of fifteen steers, which had died in some mysterious manner—nine in one place and six in another. At first sight the cattle appeared to be resting easily upon their chosen bedground, and, as there was no indication either of tympanites or a struggle, death was presumed to have been painless. An autopsy revealed that the rumen of all the steers contained about a pint of fragments of red rock, varying in size from a pigeon's egg to a pea, and in the second stomach was a less amount of the same mineral. The mucous membrane of the paunch was so severely burnt that it would peel off at the touch. This brick-like rock (called by geologists laterite) is composed of silicate of aluminium and iron oxide, which latter gives it the red color. Archdale, who has had a lifelong experience with cattle, had never seen a similar case, but rightly attributed poisonous qualities to the rock, and immediately sent away samples to various chemists. Some of the replies were to the effect that no poison could be detected; others stated that potassium nitrate was present, but not in sufficient quantities to cause the disaster. It remained for Mr. V. K. Chesnut (the eminent chemist of the Bozeman Agricultural experiment station) to clear up the mystery after he had examined numerous samples of rock. In a conclusive letter to Mr. Archdale, he pointed out that the animals were poisoned by an efflorescence which exuded from the porous rocks containing nitric and sulphuric acid salts of sodium and potassium—in other words, crude saltpetre. The quantity varied, of course, with different samples, which would explain some of the favorable verdicts returned.

AT THE EDGE OF THE BAD-LANDS

The report went on to state: "Two ounces is sometimes sufficient to kill a horse, and from four to eight ounces are nearly always fatal to horses and cows." No doubt remained as to the correctness of Mr. Chesnut's diagnosis, as the chemist's description of all the symptoms and post-mortem appearances exactly coincided with the careful observations made by Mr. Archdale. The latter was still further convinced by the following statement: "The whole course of the sickness sometimes covers only a few hours, and in a few cases death has been observed to follow within five minutes after taking the salt." Thanks to the skillful diagnosis of the Bozeman chemist, the cause of the fatalities has now been decisively ascertained; but the question still remains as to how these losses are to be prevented in future. The cattle in question (which are chiefly Hereford, with the remainder a cross between Hereford and Shorthorn) either roam over free prairie or are confined in a 5,000-acre pasture, the country consisting of wide parks bisected with creeks and enclosed by steep ranges of pine-clad scoria-topped hills. These scoria crags are of several different colors; many are red, others yellow or green, some even mauve—in fact, almost any hue may be seen. The deadly fragments of white-encrusted red rock lie scattered upon the sides of the hills or around their bases. In parts of the bad-lands, where laterite has disintegrated, a maroon powder is formed which may be collected with a spoon, and was formerly used by the Indians as war-paint. It is heartrending to ride among these hills of death and come suddenly upon a trembling eighty-dollar steer which, after reeling to and fro, succumbs in an apoplectic fit; or to see a favorite heifer vainly struggling for life, as described to me (in lit.) by Archdale, as follows: "I saw her come from one of the rocky hills and take a drink of water. She commenced to shake and wobble about, growing gradually weaker, and when it seemed that all her strength had left her she lay down. I rode away and returned to her in about half an hour. The heifer was then upon her feet trying to walk, but only went about fifty yards, when, after another attack of the staggers, she lay down again and died. The cattle have had all the salt they could eat for six weeks prior to the death of this heifer, and they would walk away from the salt to pick up a bit of this rock to chew. What is it that gives them such a craving for it?"

SHELTERING IN THE BRAKES

While the loss in these cattle from the laterite efflorescence is inconsiderable when compared to that sustained from blizzards or wolves, varying from about three per cent in one year to nil over the whole period of eight years since its commencement, there can be no question that the rock-swallowing tendency is very remarkable, and to me it is inexplicable except on the ground of a depraved hereditary appetite in certain members of the herd. It cannot be due to the lack of salt, since the owners are accustomed to haul this out in 150-pound barrels and round up the cattle to it, as alluded to in the letter already quoted. Rather may it be compared with the strange propensity of certain horses to eat hens' eggs, a case of which was recently brought to my notice. As justly observed by Mr. Chesnut, the matter is of all the more interest because new to the country, and I can myself assert, after twenty-two years' residence, that, although similar red rock occurs extensively through the pine hills and bad-lands of eastern Montana, no like fatalities have ever been thence reported.

As may be supposed, many curious accidents to cattle are discovered on the bi-annual round-ups. In two separate instances a steer was found dying of starvation, owing to a firmly-fixed tomato can on the upper jaw. In each case it was, of course, necessary to lasso and throw the animal before the obstruction could be removed. My neighbor Lund (previously mentioned) found one of his long-horned Texan steers, with its head held fast between two ash trees, as in stanchions. He rode to his nearby ranch for an axe, and, returning to the prisoner, bound its head tightly around the base of the horns to one tree before proceeding to cut down the other. This precaution was necessary with the already infuriated steer.

Building Trunks for Flying Machines

Probably the biggest trunks ever built are four which were made to order about a year ago by a New York manufacturer and which were designed to carry aeroplanes.

There were two of these flying machines, both monoplanes, and to carry them there were built four giant trunks; a trunk for each flying machine body, one trunk in which the four wings, each divided into two parts, were packed, and a fourth trunk in which were stowed four propellers.

Each of the body trunks is 36 feet long by about 45 inches square. The trunk for the wings is 25 feet long and 12 feet broad at one end and 9 feet broad at the other, while the trunk for the propellers is 9 feet long.

These tremendous trunks are finished outside in the usual fashion, canvas covered with metallic trimmings. They are so strengthened and trussed as to enable them to stand the strains to which they are likely to be subjected in use. Of course no baggageman that ever lived could sling those trunks around, and in fact the body trunks can't be got into an ordinary side door car and have to be transported in end door freight cars. The trunks have been at least once to the Pacific coast and so far under the stress of handling and travel they have stood up well.

Very likely these are the only aeroplane trunks ever built, but there are made to order many trunks for many odd uses. Theatrical trunks built to order are designed to stand wear, and they do. Besides trunks for the theatrical profession generally, there are many special trunks made to contain apparatus used in special acts by stage performers; and there are built also trunks for traveling musicians, for orchestra players or for vaudeville performers.

Perhaps the most extraordinary of all instrument trunks is the harp trunk, which is not only of great size but also of peculiar shape. Another big and remarkable trunk is that made for the carrying of a bass viol. This trunk, like that for the harp, is made to conform to the shape of the instrument. A bass viol trunk is 6½ feet in length. Smaller trunks of the same style are made for cellos.

Many brass instruments are carried by hand in specially made holders, but brass instruments are also carried about in trunks specially made for them. The player of a big bass horn, for instance, may have a trunk especially built for it. This would be a big trunk in shape and proportions of a convention trunk type, but inside there is formed a padded and plush lined deep pocket, shaped everywhere perfectly to fit the instrument in all its varying dimensions, including the big bell, a pocket into which the big horn fits snugly and in which it rides safely. There may be brass instrument trunks in which several horns of smaller sizes may be securely stowed.

The xylophone player may have a special trunk. The xylophone when played rests on a table and the player wants a table that in every way just suits him. He is likely to have a table with folding legs or with detachable legs, and if he travels he has a trunk into which the dismounted table and the instrument can be safely packed.

There are vaudeville players who play perhaps half a dozen instruments of widely diverse character and who may have a trunk built to contain them all. The violin player may have constructed in his traveling trunk a special compartment for his violin.

JOHN'S FRIENDS WERE LOYAL

Young Bride Got Early Proof of the Way Men Will Stick by One Another.

The bridegroom of three months bade his wife adieu one morning and started on a business trip to a town 25 miles distant. The journey was to be made by automobile and he promised to return in time for seven o'clock dinner as usual.

But no husband appeared when dinner was served and the anxious wife watched the hands of the clock as they journeyed on and announced that the hour was midnight, and still the husband failed to apear. The frantic wife sent telegrams to six friends of the groom living in the town where he might have gone, asking if he was spending the night with them. As dawn appeared a farm wagon drove up containing a farmer and the missing husband and furnishing motor power for a broken down automobile that trailed behind. Almost simultaneously came a messenger boy with an answer to one of the telegrams, followed at intervals by five others and all of the telegrams said:

"Yes, John is spending the night with me."

Ruling Spirit Still Strong.

Mrs. J. L. Story, who has just published a volume of reminiscences, tells of a lady relative who had all her life been afraid of damp sheets. When she was dying Mrs. Story entered the room, to find the fireplace barricaded with a large assortment of bed linen. She was having her winding sheet warmed.

"I never have lain in damp bedclothes while I was alive," said the old lady in a feeble whisper, "and I'm not going to do it when I'm dead."

And So True, Too.

Father was walking to Sunday-school with little Johnny, and endeavoring to improve the time by teaching Johnny his Golden Text, the words of which were: "Whatsoever a man soweth, that shall he also reap." Johnny repeated it after his father several times, and seemed to have mastered the correct wording.

As they drew near the Sunday-school the father gave Johnny his last rehearsal. "Now, son," he said, "let's have the Golden Text once more without any help from me:

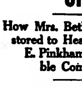
SEVEN YEARS OF MISERY

How Mrs. Bethune was Restored to Health by Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound.



Sikeston, Mo. — "For seven years I suffered everything. I was in bed for four or five days at a time every month, and so weak I could hardly walk. I had cramps, backache and headache, and was so nervous and weak that I dreaded to see anyone or have anyone move in the room. The doctors gave me medicine to ease me at those times, and said that I ought to have an operation. I would not listen to that, and when a friend of my husband's told him about Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound and what it had done for his wife, I was willing to take it. Now I look the picture of health and feel like it, too. I can do all my own housework, work in the garden and entertain company and enjoy them, and can walk as far as any ordinary woman, any day in the week. I wish I could talk to every suffering woman and girl, and tell them what Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound has done for me."—Mrs. DEMA BETHUNE, Sikeston, Mo.

Remember, the remedy which did this was Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound.

It has helped thousands of women who have been troubled with displacements, inflammation, ulceration, tumors, irregularities, periodic pains, backache, that bearing down feeling, indigestion, and nervous prostration, after all other means have failed. Why don't you try it?

The germ of suspicion is often fatal to the microbe of love.

And Prized Above All.

Where He Drew the Line.

An English earl, lately deceased, who had no family, was notorious for his hatred of children, and on one occasion he engaged as lodge keeper an army pensioner named McMicken. Some few months later McMicken's wife presented him with a son and heir. On learning of the occurrence his lordship rode down to the lodge in a terrible rage.

"I hear," said he to Mr. McMicken, "that your wife has a son."

"Yes, my lord," said the man proudly.

"Well, now, look here, McMicken; when I put you here, it was to open and shut a gate, but, by the Lord Harry, not to propagate."

Hardly the Sunday School Brand.

The young hopeful had secreted some bright buttons in his pocket, which came from the motor car show. When Sunday school was well under way, he took one out and pinned it on his coat, feeling it an ornament. Unfortunately, when the minister came round to speak to the dear children, his near sighted eyes were caught by the color.

"Well, Richard, I see you are wearing some motto, my lad. What does it say?"

"You read it, sir," replied Richard, hanging his head.

"But I cannot see. I haven't my glasses, son. Read it so we can all hear you."

Richard blushed. "It says, sir, 'Ain't it —— to be poor?'"—Metropolitan Magazine.

GOOD NIGHT'S SLEEP

No Medicine So Beneficial to Brain and Nerves.

Lying awake nights makes it hard to keep awake and do things in day time. To take "tonics and stimulants" under such circumstances is like setting the house on fire to see if you can put it out.

The right kind of food promotes refreshing sleep at night and a wide awake individual during the day.

A lady changed from her old way of eating Grape-Nuts, and says:

"For about three years I had been a great sufferer from indigestion. After trying several kinds of medicine, the doctor would ask me to drop off potatoes, then meat, and so on, but in a few days that craving, gnawing feeling would start up, and I would vomit everything I ate and drank.

"When I started on Grape-Nuts, vomiting stopped, and the bloated feeling which was so distressing disappeared entirely.

"My mother was very much bothered with diarrhoea before commencing the Grape-Nuts, because her stomach was so weak she could not digest her food. Since using Grape-Nuts food she is well, and says she don't think she could do without it.

"It is a great brain restorer and nerve builder, for I can sleep as sound and undisturbed after a supper of Grape-Nuts as in the old days when I could not realize what they meant by a 'bad stomach.' There is no medicine so beneficial to nerves and brain as a good night's sleep, such as you can enjoy after eating Grape-Nuts."

SYNOPSIS.

Lieut. Harry Mallory is ordered to the Philippines. He and Marjorie Newton decide to elope, but wreck of taxicab prevents their seeing minister on the way to the train. Transcontinental train is taking on passengers. Porter has a lively time with an Englishman and Ira Lathrop, a Yankee business man. The elopers have an exciting time getting to the train. "Little Jimmie" Wellington, bound for Reno to get a divorce, boards train in maudlin condition. Later Mrs. Jimmie appears.

CHAPTER IV. (Continued.)

When he managed to wrench his skull free, he was ready to murder his tormentor. But as soon as he confronted the doddering and blinking toper, he was helpless. Drunken men have always been treated with great tenderness in America, and when Wellington, seeing Lathrop's white hair, exclaimed with rapture: "Why, hello, Pop! here's Pop!" the most that Lathrop could do was to tear loose those fat, groping hands, slap them like a school teacher, and push the man away.

But that one shove upset Mr. Wellington and sent him toppling down upon the pit of the Englishman's stomach.

For Wedgewood, it was suddenly as if all the air had been removed from the world. He gulped like a fish drowning for lack of water. He was a long while getting breath enough for words, but his first words were wild demands that Mr. Wellington remove himself forthwith.

Wellington accepted the banishment with the sorrowful eyes of a dying deer, and tottered away wagging his fat head and wailing:

"I'm a broken-hearted man, and nobody gives a—." At this point he caromed over into Ira Lathrop's berth and was welcomed with a savage roar:

"What the devil's the matter with you?"

"I'm a broken-hearted man, that's all."

"Oh, is that all," Lathrop snapped, vanishing behind his newspaper. The desperately melancholy seeker for a word of human kindness blesred at the blurred newspaper well a while, then waded into a new attempt at acquaintance. Laying his hand on Lathrop's knee, he stammered: "Esscuzhe me, Mr.—Mr—"

From behind the newspaper came a stingy answer: "Lathrop's my name—if you want to know."

"Pleased to meet you, Mr. Lothrop."

"Lathrop!"

"Lathrop! My name's Wellington. Li'l Jimmie Wellington. Ever hear of me?"

He waited with the genial smile of a famous man; the smile froze at Lathrop's curt, "Don't think so."

He tried again: "Ever hear of well-known Chicago belle, Mrs. Jimmie Wellington?"

"Yes, I've heard of her!"

Wellington waved his hand with modest pride. "Well, I'm Jimmie."

"Serves you right."

This jolt was so discourteous that Wellington decided to protest: "Mister Latham!"

"Lathrop!"

The name came out with a whip-snap. He tried to echo it, "Lå-throp!"

"I don't like that Throp. That's a kind of a seasick name, isn't it?" Finding the newspaper still intervening between him and his prey, he calmly tore it down the middle and pushed through it like a moon coming through a cloud. "But a man can't change his name by marrying, can he? That's the worst of it. A woman can. Think of a heartless cobra di capello in woman's form wearing my fair name—and wearing it out. Mr. La-throp, did you ever put your trust in a false-hearted woman?"

"Never put my trust in anybody."

"Didn't you ever love a woman?"

"No!"

"Well, then, didn't you ever marry a woman?"

"Not one. I've had the measles and the mumps, but I've never had matrimony."

"Oh, lucky man," beamed Wellington. "Hang on to your luck."

"I intend to," said Lathrop, "I was born single and I like it."

"Oh, how I envy you! You see, Mrs. Wellington—she's a queen among women, mind you—a queen among women, but she has the 'stravagance of a—"

Lathrop had endured all he could endure, even from a privileged character. But the very vigor of this departure only served to help Wellington to his feet, for he seized Lathrop's coat and hung on, through the door, down the little corridor, always explaining:

"Mrs. Wellington is a queen among women, mind you, but I can't stand [illegible]

He had hardly squeezed into the smoking-room when the porter and an usher almost invisible under the baggage they carried brought in a new passenger. Her first question was:

"Oh, porter, did a box of flowers, or candy, or anything, come for me?"

"What name would they be in, miss?"

"Mrs. Wellington—Mrs. James Wellington."

CHAPTER V.

A Queen Among Women.

Miss Anne Gattle, seated in Mrs. Jimmie Wellington's seat, had not heard Mr. Jimmie Wellington's sketch of his wife. But she needed hardly more than a glance to satisfy herself that she and Mrs. Jimmie were as hopelessly antipathetic as only two polite women can be.

Mrs. Jimmie was accounted something of a snob in Chicago society, but perhaps the missionary was a trifle the snobbisher of the two when they met.

Miss Gattle could overlook a hundred vices in a Zulu queen more easily than a few in a fellow countrywoman. She did not like Mrs. Jimmie, and she was proud of it.

When the porter said, "I'm afraid you got this lady's seat," Miss Gattle shot one glance at the intruder and rose stiffly. "Then I suppose I'll have to—"

"Oh, please don't go, there's plenty of room," Mrs. Wellington insisted, pressing her to remain. This nettled Miss Gattle still more, but she sank back, while the porter piled up expensive traveling-bags and hat boxes till there was hardly a place to sit. But even at that Mrs. Jimmie felt called on to apologize:

"I haven't brought much luggage. How I'll ever live four days with this, I can't imagine. It will be such a relief to get my trunks at Reno."

"Reno?" echoed Miss Gattle. "Do you live there?"

"Well, theoretically, yes."

"I don't understand you."

"I've got to live there to get it."

"To get it? Oh!" A look of sudden and dreadful realization came over the missionary. Mrs. Wellington interpreted it with a smile of gay defiance:

"Do you believe in divorces?"

Anne Gattle stuck to her guns. "I must say I don't. I think a law ought to be passed stopping them."

"So do I," Mrs. Wellington amiably agreed, "and I hope they'll pass just such a law—after I get mine." Then she ventured a little shaft of her own. "You don't believe in divorces. I judge you've never been married."

"Not once!" The spinster drew herself up, but Mrs. Wellington disarmed her with an unexpected bouquet:

"Oh, lucky woman! Don't let any heartless men delude you into taking the fatal step."

Anne Gattle was nothing if not honest. She confessed frankly: "I must say that nobody has made any violent efforts to compel me to. That's why I'm going to China."

"To China!" Mrs. Wellington gasped, hardly believing her ears. "My dear! You don't intend to marry a laundryman?"

"The idea! I'm going as a missionary."

"A missionary? Why leave Chicago?" Mrs Wellington's eye softened more or less convincingly: "Oh, lovely! How I should dote upon being a missionary. I really think that after I get my divorce I might have a try at it. I had thought of a convent, but being a missionary must be much more exciting." She dismissed the dream with an abrupt shake of the head. "Excuse me, but do you happen to have any matches?"

"Matches! I never carry them!"

"They never have matches in the women's room, and I've used my last one."

Miss Gattle took another reef in her tight lips. "Do you smoke cigarettes?"

Mrs. Wellington's echoed disgust with disgust: "Oh, no, indeed. I loathe them. I have the most dainty little cigars. Did you ever try one?"

Miss Gattle stiffened into one exclamation point: "Cigars! Me!"

Mrs. Jimmie was so well used to being disapproved of that it never disturbed her. She went on as if the face opposite were not alive with horror: "I should think that cigars might be a great consolation to a lady missionary in the long lone hours of—what do missionaries do when they're not missionarying?"

"That depends."

There was something almost spiritual in Mrs. Jimmie's beatific look: "I can't tell you what consolation my cigars have given me in my troubles. Mr. Wellington objected—but then Mr. Wellington objected to nearly everything I did. That's why I am forced to this dreadful step."

"Cigars?"

"Divorces."

"Divorces!"

"Well, this will be only my second—my other was such a nuisance. I got that from Jimmie, too. But it didn't take. Then we made up and remarried. Rather odd, having a second honeymoon with one's first husband. But remarriage didn't succeed any better. Jimmie fell off the water-wagon with an awful splash, and he quite misunderstood my purely platonic interest in Sammy Whitcomb, a nice young fellow with a fool of a wife. Did you ever meet Mrs. Sammy Whitcomb—no? Oh, but you are a lucky woman! Indeed you are! Well, when Jimmie got jealous, I just gave him up entirely. I'm running away to Reno. I sent a note to my husband's club, saying that I had gone to Europe, and he needn't try to find me. Poor fellow, he will! He'll hunt the continent high and low for me, but all the while I'll be in Nevada. [illegible]

"But now I must go. Now I must go. I've really become quite addicted to them."

"Divorces?"

"Cigars. Do stay here till I come back. I have so much to say to you."

Miss Gattle shook her head in despair. She could understand a dozen heathen dialects better than the speech of so utter a foreigner as her fellow-countrywoman. Mrs. Jimmie hastened away, rather pleased at the shocks she had administered.

In the corridor she administered another thrill—this time to a tall young man—a stranger, as alert for flirtation as a weasel for mischief. He huddled himself and his suitcases into as flat a space as possible, murmuring:

"These corridors are so narrow, aren't they?"

"Aren't they?" said Mrs. Jimmie. "So sorry to trouble you."

"Don't mention it."

She passed on, their glances fencing like playful foils. Then she paused:

"Excuse me. Could you lend me a match? They never have matches in the Women's Room."

He succeeded in producing a box after much shifting of burdens, and he was rewarded with a look and a phrase:

"You have saved my life."

He started to repeat his "Don't mention it," but it seemed inappropriate, so he said nothing, and she vanished behind a door. He turned away, saying to himself that it promised to be a pleasant journey. He was halted by another voice—another woman's voice:

"Pardon me, but is this the car for Reno?"

He turned to smile, "I believe so!" Then his eyes widened as he recognized the speaker.

"Mrs. Sammy Whitcomb!"

It promised to be a curious journey.

CHAPTER VI.

A Conspiracy in Satin.

The tall man emptied one hand of its suitcase to clasp the hand the newcomer granted him. He held it fast as he exclaimed: "Don't tell me that you are bound for Reno!" She whimpered: "I'm afraid so, Mr. Ashton."

He put down everything to take her other hand, and tuned his voice to condolence: "Why, I thought you and Sam Whitcomb were—"

"Oh, we were until that shameless Mrs. Wellington—"

"Mrs. Wellington? Don't believe I know her."

"I thought everybody had heard of Mrs. Jimmie Wellington."

"Mrs. Jimmie—oh, yes, I've heard of her!"

"What a dance she has led her poor husband!" Mrs. Whitcomb said. "And my poor Sammy fell into her trap, too."

Ashton, zealous comforter, took a wrathful tone: "I always thought your husband was the most unmitigated—" But Mrs. Whitcomb bridled at once. "How dare you criticise Sammy! He's the nicest boy in the world."

Ashton recovered quickly. "That's what I started to say. Will he contest the—divorce?"

"Of course not," she beamed. "The dear fellow would never deny me anything. Sammy offered to get it himself, but I told him he'd better stay in Chicago and stick to business. I shall need such a lot of alimony."

"Too bad he couldn't have come along," Ashton insinuated.

But the irony was wasted, for she sighed: "Yes, I shall miss him terribly. But we feared that if he were with me it might hamper me in getting a divorce on the ground of desertion."

Jimmie Welington.

She was trying to look earnest and thoughtful and heartbroken, but the result was hardly plausible, for Mrs. Sammy Whitcomb could not possibly have been really earnest or really thoughtful; and her heart was quite too elastic to break. She proved it instantly, for when she heard behind her the voice of a young man asking her to let him pass, she turned to protest, but seeing that he was a handsome young man, her starch was instantly changed to sugar. And as she [illegible]

MORE HOSPITALS ARE NEEDED

Situation Improved, but Further Work Is Needed to Stamp Out Tuberculosis.

Only four states, Mississippi, Nevada, Utah and Wyoming, have no beds whatever in special hospitals or wards for consumptives. Eight years ago when the National Association for the Study and Prevention of Tuberculosis was organized there were 26 states in which no hospital or sanitorium provision for consumptives existed, and the entire number of beds in the United States was only 10,000.

"While these figures would indicate a remarkable growth in anti-tuberculosis activity," says Dr. Livingston Farrand, executive secretary of the National association, in commenting on the subject, there are still practically ten indigent consumptives for every one of the 30,000 beds, including those for pay patients. In other words, we have from 250,000 to 300,000 consumptives in this country too poor to provide hospital care for themselves. If tuberculosis is ever going to be stamped out in the United States, more hospital provision for these foci of infection must be provided."

Willing to Oblige.

A story comes from a town where firms advertise to sell fish direct to small purchasers. The glowing advertisements asked for the sending of half a dollar with a list of the varieties of fish preferred. One letter read:

"I want two salmon, a dozen whiting, a dozen fresh herring, some flounders, and if you have them you can add a lobster."

The next day the lady received a letter, which ran:

"Dear Madam: Please send another dime and we will forward the fisherman."—Dallas News.

SKIN ERUPTION ON CHEEK

Kingsley, Mich.—"Last May my thirteen-months-old baby had a sore come on her cheek. It started in four or five small pimples and in two or three hours' time spread to the size of a silver dollar. It spread to her eye. Then water would run from the pimples and wherever that touched it caused more sores until nearly all one cheek and up her nostrils were one solid sore. She was very fretful. She certainly was a terrible looking child, and nothing seemed to be of any use.

"Then I got some Cuticura Soap and Cuticura Ointment. She tried to rub off everything we put on so that we would sit and hold her hands for two hours at a time, trying to give the medicine a chance to help her, but after I washed it with Cuticura Soap and then put on the Cuticura Ointment they seemed to soothe her and she did not try to rub them off. It was only a few days before her face was all healed up, and there has been no return of the trouble since. We thought that baby's face would surely be scarred, but it is not." (Signed) Mrs. W. J. Cleland, Jan. 5, 1912.

Singing and the Lungs.

It is well known that singing, like whistling, is a fine exercise for the lungs, and some doctors advise those who fear consumption to go in for singing for this reason.

At the same time they, of course, do not advance the claim that singing alone will save anyone from or cure consumption. Acquire the habit of taking the big deep breath, which is a primary requisite of any kind of singing, bad or good, and the physical joy derived from it will never allow you to relapse into lazy breathing.

WATER SPORTS of HONOLULU

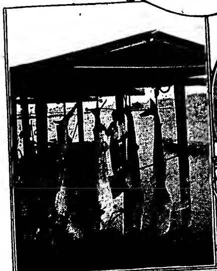
by Bromley B. Barretson

HONOLULU goes in for water sports to a greater extent, probably, than any other city in the world. All kinds of aquatic games are indulged in, but the most popular are also among the most dangerous and are specialized in here to a degree that makes them almost a distinctive Hawaiian diversion. Surf-riding is one of the most common of these water sports and is full of excitement for both participants and onlookers. In outriggered canoes the natives ride the breakwater waves as they rush shoreward, and, it is almost superfluous to add, it is a sport that calls for a steady nerve and no little skill.

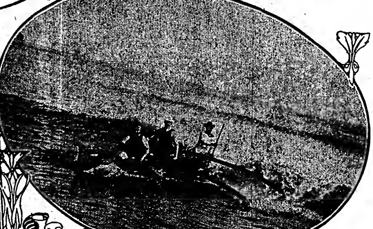
Riding the surf on planks is another form of this sport practiced by the visitors at Waikiki beach, and is just as exciting and dangerous.

RIDING the SURF

But the most exciting and dangerous of Hawaiian water sports is shark hunting. This sport is indulged in in the vicinity of Honolulu bay. Power boats of about four tons displacement are generally used. In the company of a congenial Honolulu sportsman I went out to try my hand at the game. We left the harbor at 8 o'clock in the morning, at which early hour the bay and vicinity is alive with people engaged in all kinds of fishing. Just as we started we came across a number of Japanese; some were wading up to their waists in the shallow water and others were angling from boats. Outside the bay men in two-oared punts were hunting for sea turtles, which in these waters average from 400 to 500 pounds in weight. I watched one of the boats for a while. It moved slowly along, then suddenly stopped. An oarsman seized a rifle from the side of the boat and fired at a turtle just seen rising to the surface of the water, but it is no easy matter to hit a mark at a distance of from 50 to 60 yards from a rolling boat, and the turtle escaped. Twice after that I heard the fisherman fire, then silence followed. He had lost sight of the prey. Apparently the turtles are not very plentiful, as I saw but two during the entire day.



THE CATCH AFTER A DAY'S SHARK HUNTING



SPEEDING SHORE-WARD AFTER HAVING CAUGHT A SWELL

Arriving at the shark-haunted spot, about a mile from shore, we stopped our motor boat and prepared to try conclusions with the dreaded monster of the deep. Our bait—two fattened, flayed sheep—was attached to an air-tight tin buoy and thrown overboard. The hooks were attached to the buoy by ropes several yards in length.

SURFERS READY TO START FOR THE WATER WITH THEIR SURF BOARDS

After waiting an hour and a half, during which time the traditional trade wind had wafted our little craft well out from shore, our boatman called our attention to the fact that a shark was hovering around the bait attached to the buoy. From a distance the presence of the monster in the rather ruffled water was betrayed by a yellowish-green, oblong, shadow-like line just below the surface of the water. We let the creature swim about to his heart's content, and after reconnoitering for a few minutes he took courage and bit a large chunk off the sheep, using such force that part of his body actually rose above the surface. Twice, after short intervals, he again attacked the bait. Meanwhile, we had been drawing the bait nearer the boat. By this time two other sharks had appeared, but one of them seemed to have had a taste of the hook, for he writhed as if in pain and then swam away. Our young boatman, who had had considerable experience in harpooning sharks, took up a position on the covered part of the boat, harpoon in hand, ready to thrust. The shark again approached the boat and we could see his every movement quite distinctly. We gradually drew the bait almost up to the boat and the infuriated monster was now biting ravenously at the bait within easy reach of our craft. As he rose partially to the surface our man drove the harpoon into him, but not in a fatal spot, and as I thought, not with sufficient force. The harpoon merely grazed his side. Four times the boatman threw the harpoon, each time missing, and finally the hungry creature gave up in disgust and relinquished all further attacks upon the bait.

That it was always the same monster that made the furious attacks on the bait I was quite convinced, for I could clearly see the marks of the harpoon on his body. The behavior of the second shark, which only tasted the bait, and of the third was quite different. They wasted little time fooling with the bait and quickly made off. So it seems not all sharks are alike in disposition, or perhaps a difference in the degree of hunger or a half-satisfied appetite explains the contrast in conduct. Out of patience with the clumsy hastiness of our fisherman, we returned from our first trip empty-handed.

On the occasion of our second excursion we started at 7 o'clock in the morning and were accompanied by an experienced fisherman and an expert harpoonist. We started under favorable auspices. The sailors on a large vessel that had been riding at anchor since the previous evening informed us that four or five sharks had been seen hovering about the vessel, on the watch for prey. For bait on this occasion we used a large joint of beef, instead of sheep. We stopped near the large vessel and set our bait. The sailors signaled to us that a shark was swimming about, now here, now there, and in less than half an hour one of the hooks had caught one of the monsters. For ten or twenty seconds the victim tugged vigorously to free himself and then remained so still that we thought it had escaped. However, with a view to examining the bait, we began to pull in the rope, and with it came a good-sized fish. To prevent a long struggle I put a bullet into its side the moment it reached the surface of the water. All at once it stretched out and the harpoonist thrust his weapon into its flat forehead, about four to five inches from the edge of the mouth.

Scarcely had we tied the prey to the side of the boat, when the men on the big steamer began to fire at the sharks swimming all around us. They did no damage to the sharks and certainly did not improve our sport, for none of the monsters appeared again for some time.

As my fellow fisherman had important business to transact I took him ashore during the forenoon, and returned to continue the sport. About 4 o'clock in the afternoon a courageous or very hungry shark attacked the bait four times before he met his doom. As an experiment I shot him in the belly, and the bullet had a much more decisive effect than in the case of the first fish. The length of the first fish was 6.5 feet, and that of the second 7.8 feet. The former was yellowish-green in color and the latter was striped like a tiger.

On this day the sharks took little notice of the large bait floating on the surface and were evidently looking for prey deeper down. I can find no satisfactory explanation for this as the weather conditions were practically the same on both days. It is possible that the difference in bait was responsible, as the fat, flayed sheep used on the first occasion were white in color, while that employed on the second day was dark in color and devoid of fat. The natives believe that the sight of the shark is defective, and that that is the reason the monster rarely attacks the brown-skinned natives. Perhaps they are right.

HISTORY OF PANAMA

Spaniards in 15th Century Landed at Site of Canal.

Tales of Rich Gold Deposits Were Responsible for Many Adventurers Leaving Home to Seek the El Dorado in the New World.

Colon, Panama.—It was lust for gold that brought the Spaniards to America in the fifteenth century. It was the same lust that led them to make many daring trips of exploration into the interior. An expedition set out from the island of Haiti one day in the year 1513. When the vessel was well out to the sea, and the wooded shores of the island had grown dim in the distance, the adventurers were amazed to hear muffled shouting from the hold and a noise of knocking. The sound was coming from one of a number of great casks, supposed to contain dried beef, and when the noisy cask was discovered and the end knocked off, a well-built young man, clad in the velvet garments gentlefolk wore at that time, sprang out. Several of the adventurers recognized him as Vesco Nunazele Balboa, a young man known to many of the colonists of Haiti.

Balboa explained that he had chosen this way of coming aboard because his creditors were watching him so closely that he knew they would never have permitted him to leave the island openly, but would have caused him to be seized and cast into debtors' prison.

The destination of this party of adventure was Darien, near the site of the Panama canal. No man knew what lay across the isthmus, and indeed most Spaniards believed at that time that the West Indies were islands off the coast of Asia.

When the vessel which Balboa had boarded so unceremoniously reached the mainland of Central America members of the little Spanish colony already there refused to allow the captain of the vessel to come ashore, for he had an evil reputation. The other men, however, went ashore under the leadership of Balboa and at once began a trip of exploration. Balboa made an alliance with a powerful Indian chief who ruled that portion of the land, and married the chief's daughter. At the wedding feast the Indians brought rich gifts of slaves and gold, and were amazed to see how the eyes of the Spaniards glittered at sight of the yellow metal and how they quarreled over it.

Tower of the Castle of the Old City of Panama.

At once Balboa fitted up an expedition to cross the mountains to the land of gold. With him he took 200 men and a pack of savage dogs, which should attack unfriendly Indians.

Balboa called the new ocean the South sea, because he was looking toward the south when first he saw it. But he and his followers, though they had discovered a new ocean, failed to find the land of gold for which they had set out. He then returned to Darien and sent word to the Spanish king of the great discovery which he had made. Then he caused for small ships to be taken apart and carried across the mountains, believing that somewhere on the other side of the new ocean lay the El Dorado. These vessels were set up again and launched, the first European ships to dip keel in the great South sea. But before Balboa had equipped them fully and put out to sea his enemies, hurrying across the isthmus, captured him, accusing him of plots against the king. There was no evidence of any such plotting on Balboa's part, but those were lawless times, and the men of Darien were jealous of Balboa. In less than 24 hours he was tried, found guilty, condemned to death and beheaded.

Turk Blows Up House.

Pottsville, Pa.—John Turk of Tuscarora was informed that a violent shock would exterminate the bedbugs which recently have been bothering his sleep. Taking the advice at face value Turk secured a quantity of dynamite, placed it under the bed and exploded it. The shock exterminated the insects, also the bed and the house in which the bed once was. When Turk came to he was sitting in the middle of the road.

Corea, A Land of Contrasts

Contrasts between the customs of Corea and those of other countries are striking everywhere. In other lands when a man wants to remove a hog from one pasture to another he drives it or tolls it with corn. Not so in Corea. Here a stout laboring man catches a full grown hog, ties its feet together, puts it on a wood frame made from the limbs of trees and carries it to market. The same wood frame is used by the porter who carries your trunk from the station to the hotel instead of using a truck or wheelbarrow.

In other countries the tiger, the leopard and the elephant inhabit the tropics. In Corea these animals flourish in a climate as severe as that of Ontario. The fur of the Corean tiger is longer and glossier than that of his cousin in the jungles of tropical India, for the same reason that the coat of a raccoon is finer in winter than in summer when it is not needed for warmth.

The Corean tiger is a royal looking beast, seen frequently standing in a commanding position upon a snow-covered mountainside looking down disdainfully at a passing train and growling the protesting native's answer to the shriek of the invading "mogul."

Sporting Englishmen have a few shooting boxes in Corea and like to hunt elephants there because the climate is far more agreeable to them than that of Burma, Ceylon or Africa, where elephants are found.

Fine bulls loaded with the branches of trees used as firewood are a common sight in the streets of Seoul. Ponies are ridden, but never used to draw vehicles as they are in other countries, and cattle are never killed for beef. Cows, which have been known in Corea for scores of centuries, are never milked, or were not until a few years ago, and the Coreans never knew anything about dairy products.

In most countries the horse is considered a better mount than the donkey. Not so in Corea. There the meek and slow moving ass is regarded as the best riding animal.

Street signs are relied upon in the cities of other countries, and nowhere are they more used than in China, which formerly exercised a shadowy suzerainty over Corea and was her neighbor. But in Seoul they were not used at all before the Japanese came. In almost all other countries women are fond of going shopping and merchants strive to please them.

In Corea it is otherwise. The women regard shopping as a necessary evil, and the merchants keep their goods in closets instead of on counters and shelves and in showcases. The merchant does not hustle for trade or argue for a sale. If the customer asks for something else she is likely to be shown what the merchant has and told that he has nothing like what she wants.

The Corean method of fingering the violin is exactly the reverse to that of western people. The Corean fingers the instrument near the bridge with his right hand. With his left he plucks the strings at the other end and he uses no bow at all.

In most countries retailing liquors is not regarded as a suitable avenue of activity for an aristocratic woman whose fortune has dwindled. In Corea a lady in distress may operate a saloon without fear of any social stigma resting upon her. And a bar is the only kind of shop she may keep with impunity. Her maid acts as barmaid, but the saloon is given space in the residence without injuring the tone of the establishment. A woman of social distinction may make shoes provided she makes such as the common people wear. To make shoes for her own class would remove her from that class.

A Corean lady in reduced circumstances may become a physician, and to protect the occupation from overcrowding the law of Corea, before the Japanese occupation, provided that no woman who was not an aristocrat might practice medicine. Powdered tiger claws, bear's gall and other remedies that do not appear in the pharmacopoeia are prescribed. But the common custom is to cure disease by making a straw image of the patient and emphasizing the seat of the affliction by making the afflicted region or member abnormally large. The manikin is thrown out of doors, and it is believed that any one who picks it up will get the disease.

Bacteriologists agree that this is sometimes the case, but they disagree with the Corean physicians as to the relief of the patient by this means. The appearance of the manikins found in the street or along the roadside is often ludicrous. When all efforts to cast off the devil fail the patient is put out of doors and left to die.

Even in the amusements of children contrasts with western customs are observable. Instead of making a "seesaw" Corean girls and boys lay a long board over a log or fence with one end fastened down and jump up and down on the elevated end, the impact of the weight tossing the other into the air. A long residence in Corea would be required to ascertain all of the differences in custom marking the antipodal point of view. In most countries the octopus is a dreaded sea monster and a synonym for evil. Black is not worn for mourning in Corea. White is prescribed by custom.

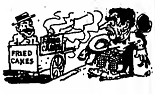
NATIONAL CAPITAL AFFAIRS

Weather Is Decidedly Hot at Capital



WASHINGTON.—It is decidedly hot in Washington. There is nothing especially new or startling in this statement, may be, but it serves neatly as an introduction to the interesting narrative appended. During the summer months, it seems, when a Washington resident is not discussing the baseball team he occupies his time figuring reasons for the utter success of heat here.

Numbers of perfectly reasonable reasons have been so figured. Humidity, for one; the discouraging, mushy asphalt; the white buildings; the wide streets—oh, any number of reasons.

"Well, I admit that the mornings in Washington are pretty hot. And toward noon it is hot. But again, we have the afternoon. Ah, then it is hot. Yet our wonderful evenings and toward midnight! What a pleasant change the heat is!" said an old resident.

That's the sort of day it was. The visitor referred to was plodding along, attempting to be unconscious of his swinging doors on the other side of which, it is a matter of common report, most cooling beverages may be obtained.

The visitor noticed a tiny wagon. It was much after the order of the old fashioned "hokey pokey" cart. It drew up to the curbing. On the cart was the legend:

"Fried Cakes!"

One can scarcely imagine the effect of that sign unless it has confronted one through the quivering heat waves of Washington.

The walker staggered on. Came then another cart, fashioned in the manner of the first. A sign on its side proclaimed:

"Roasted Peanuts!"

The visitor's grew dry. The heat seemed to increase. But that was the error of a heat persecuted mind. As he swayed there, around the corner came a third wagon. On it was a third sign:

'Hot Sausage!"

With a wild and despairing yell the Washington visitor fled.

"Black Hand" Rumor Disturbs Capitol

TALK ABOUT BLACK HAND !!

UNWONTED excitement disturbed the usual morning calm of the capitol, when it was whispered that a senator had received a message from the "Black Hand." Immediately there were visions of detectives tracing up every evanescent clue, for it had been stated positively over the phone by the senator that he was the victim of a Black Hand disaster.

There was consternation when the senator was encountered at the golf links, and an excited group of players surrounded him to quiz about the alarming missive. "What about that 'Black Hand' letter?" they cried.

"What 'Black Hand' letter?" asked the senator absently.

"Why, the one you were talking about this morning."

"I think I threw it in the waste basket."

"We must have that letter, senator," put in a young reporter earnestly. "Your co-operation with the press and the officers of the law will mean much in——"

"Say, young men," broke in the senator, "is this a joke?" He was cultivating the language necessary for use (with mules) in intensified farming and indulged in a few epithets before he stated:

"That 'Black Hand' is nothing—nothing at all I tried to fill my fountain pen this morning with indelible ink, and I still have the black hand with me." For proof he held up an inky palm which liberal applications of pumice-stone had failed to whiten.

This was the newspaper rumor quieted. The disgusted golfers sauntered away to conceal their feelings, and the senator went back to his game, wondering why it was that a men could not even talk about his fountain pen without awakening reportorial energy and national attention.—Chappie's News Letter.

"Love, Not Larceny" Leads to Arrest

IT WAS LOVE THAT GOT ME HERE —

JAMES Harris Champion, reared on a farm in Alabama, the only other product of which was one bale of cotton a year, came to Washington the other day to earn a livelihood. Only one day of joyous freedom was enjoyed by Champion, and then his dream of world conquest was nipped in the bud by the police, and then James, looking from between the bars at the First precinct station, muttered:

"It was love, not larceny, that got me here."

And then Champion told the police a story of a starved soul, a crippled body, and the first sight of a beautiful women—the most beautiful woman he had ever seen—and how infatuation for Lee Chapman, whom the police well know, compelled him to live a lie and the consequences of it.

"Wednesday evening. I met Lee Chapman on the street. She was the prettiest woman I ever saw."

"I didn't have any money and I saw I couldn't make much headway with her without money, so I went to the best jeweler in Washington and ordered $4,000 worth of jewelry. I told them I was stopping at the Raleigh and I would send for the jewelry.

"When I met Lee I told her I was going to give them to her, and she threw her arms about my neck and kissed me."

Champion is held on a charge of larceny. The lavilear and ring were found on the prisoner.

Coreless Apple Alarms Pie-Eaters

WASHINGTON restaurant men and their customers were much disturbed the other day over the news from Georgetown, Del., that a man of that place, had succeeded in developing an apple that has no core.

"It's an outrage," said the proprietor of one restaurant, when he saw the dispatch. "Something ought to be done. Oh, Mr. Rigger!"

A wiry looking man of about fifty, who was lighting a cigarette at the cigar lighter, came over to where the proprietor stood.

"Mr. Rigger," explained the proprietor, "is one of the oldest customers I have. He has been taking his meals in this restaurant for 20 years. It ought to be of interest to get his views on the subject." Whereupon the contents of the dispatch were explained to the customer.

"I, for one, won't stand for it," declared Mr. Rigger firmly. "I have been eating in this place so long that it would seem like breaking home ties to stop it; but if this restaurant ever [illegible] pies I'll have to go somewhere else."

"Quiet yourself, Mr. Rigger," interposed the proprietor. "I intend to see that your rights are protected. I simply won't buy pies made of coreless apples."

"Thank you!" exclaimed Mr. Rigger.

At the headquarters of the Waiters' union the news met with a chilly reception.

"What do you think of it?" one of the officers of the union was asked.

"Think of it? Well, I think there will be a waiters' strike if they try to introduce these coreless apples. If we served guests with apple pies that had no seeds in them, we never [illegible]

In the PUBLIC EYE

MAJOR-GEN. LEONARD WOOD

A word just at the present moment might not be out of place concerning Maj. Gen. Leonard Wood, U. S. A., who is also, as everyone knows, an M. D. A writer has called him "One result of the Spanish war." Major General Wood is a New Hampshire man, and he was born in Winchester in that state just 52 years ago. And he is also a Harvard man with his two degrees of M. D. and LL. D. He was an assistant surgeon stationed in Washington when Mr. Roosevelt was assistant secretary of the navy. They rode together and they were both crack shots, and the best of friends. It is said that the Rough Riders was the inspiration of the then Dr. Wood, and that at the breaking out of the Spanish war such a regiment of men who knew how to ride and how to shoot—plainsmen and cowboys—was organized. And in it were mustered a number of New York clubmen of fashion, who were fond of outdoor sports. The only son of the late Nicholas Fish, the late "Ham" Fish, who was killed in the charge at San Juan Hill, was in this regiment. The story is historic. After the war Dr. Wood was made governor general of Cuba and became a brigadier general in 1901. Two years later he was made major-general by President Roosevelt. After that came his experience in the Philippines, then followed his appointment as commander of the department of the east, and then chief of the general staff.

"SCOTTY'S" MINE IS A MYTH

"Death Valley Scotty" told a Los Angeles grand jury the other day that the president of a life insurance company had grubstaked him for years, and that a New York mining engineer put up the $10,000 which Scotty paid for the special train in which the Death Valley man made his spectacular trip across the continent several years ago.

Scotty also testified that he had tried to persuade the officers of the Death Valley Scotty Gold Mining and Developing company to locate a few mining claims in Death Valley, in order to give the mining scheme the appearance of genuineness, but alleged that they refused to do so, saying it was unnecessary.

Scotty told the grand jury that his "hole in the ground down in Death Valley" is a myth, which has been used for years to fill the pockets of the promoters.

With the exception of F. C. Goodwin, the secretary of the company, and its treasurer, Goldworthy, the officers of the mining concern, have apparently dropped from sight.

Scotty said the most he ever had at one time was $3,000.

RENE BAZIN SUBMITS A RECIPE

Rene Bazin never cared for the superman nor even for the overcivilized type of man. He never used the word eugenics. Science and matter are to him negligible factors when they are not supplemented by culture and the spirit,

In these days, when every one is greatly concerned with anthropoculture, Bazin had to come forth with his little recipe for breeding good human specimens.

"The man whom tomorrow will demand," he said in a recent address, "is the thorough and fearless man, the man who will do his work well and for whom life will have no terrors. The training of this man will require the same methods as the training of a Christian, for if there ever is a superman he will be a Christian. If there is a nobility whose ranks are open to all it is the nobility of Christianity, which assures perfect equality to every soul in every field of endeavor and under any circumstances. A mind is very incomplete, a heart is very weak, if they are swayed by human impulses only. Whoever fails to feel the religious urge misses one-half of life and one-half of love besides misunderstanding one-half of history."

MR. CHUNG, CHINA'S MINISTER

Greatly to the surprise of the diplomatic prophets, Dr. Wu Ting-Fang was not sent as minister from the Chinese republic to Washington, but Mr. Chung Mun Yew, the former Chinese coxswain of Yale, appeared as the first minister of the new republic. No explanation was forthcoming as to why the change had been made, and although Dr. Wu and his charming wife are missed, yet Mr. Chung is well known at the capital, and has many friends in the state department and among the diplomatic corps. He comes to this country with an established record at Yale, for he was a member of the winning boat crew that fluttered the [illegible] pennant. It is also said [illegible] upon that [illegible] has [illegible] to do with [illegible] "full hand"—for [illegible] classics at Yale. [illegible]

HAPPENINGS IN THE CITIES

Swordfish and Sharks Fight to Death

NEW YORK.—That hardiest of hardy ship news annals, the story of the deep sea quarrel between swordfish and whale—it was a shark this time—reached port in good order the other day on board the staunch ship Caledonia.

It was a calm and beautiful Sabbath morn at sea. The Caledonia plowing her way through a bottle-green ocean, was 60 miles due east of Moetauk Point. Captain F. H. Wedsworth was on the bridge. Passengers and crew lazed idly on deck. All was peace and tranquility. Suddenly some one with keen eyesight espied the perennial commotion in the water just off the ship's bows. All eyes at once peered seaward.

To their utter amazement and delight, what should meet their wondering eyes but scores—aye, scores—of swordfish and sharks frolicking in friendly play about the ship!

It was easy to see that they were making a splendid Sunday dinner of bluefish, mackerel, porgies, flounders.

Having feasted on the fat of the sea, the monsters of the deep frolicked some more, darting hither and yon through the salt sea waves. Playfully, the swordfish ran their swords beneath the bodies of the sharks and tossed them high in the air, then deftly caught them and repeated the performance. The sharks, in turn, took playful swipes at the swordfish and chased them all around the ship. This continued for an hour, when one of the swordfish erred in his judgment of distance and caught a shark on the point of his bony nose, piercing the shark and ending his career.

With the death of their schoolmate, the sharks, becoming infuriated, turned upon the swordfish, and the battle which followed—from all accounts—was indescribably horrible.

How a "Dock" Waiter Served the Soup

BALTIMORE, MD.—Charles F. Murphy, during the recent convention, deigned to breakfast in the main dining room of the Emerson hotel. It was usually more comfortable for convention guests (if they had pull enough to get the service) to dine in their room. But it was the quaint mood of Mr. Murphy to mingle with the masses.

Mr. Murphy is one of the most scholarly looking persons in political life these days. He looks more like a college professor than Woodrow Wilson or George Harvey of the barrel-hooped spectacles ever did in their lives.

Thus, then, he sat at one of the tables in the main dining room of the Emerson.

Waiters were scarce in Baltimore. A number of energetic, though unrefined, persons from the water front (more used to hand trucks and the bale hooks than the napkin and the menu card) had been hired to fill the emergency, and had been disguised in dress clothes.

One of these, bearing a silver tureen of beautifully red tomato soup, bore through the aisle of the tables along which sat Mr. Murphy.

The waiter's solar plexus and the shoulder of Mr. Murphy met in a head-on collision. The beautiful red tomato soup was spilled across Mr. Murphy's coat just south of and a few inches below his right ear. It was poured out with all the accuracy of a steam dredge discharging a bucket load of mud into a dump car.

But the dock front men met the crisis like a hero. He grabbed the napkin from Mr. Murphy's lap and scrubbed the Tammany leader's shoulder with it.

Sorority Girls Read Their Bibles

H-O-M-E-R
C-L-E-M-
— I DON'T THINK I WILL PLAY ANY MORE —

DETROIT, Mich.—Sorority girls have taken to reading their Bibles. The sixth verse of Solomon's eighth song is that part of the Holy Scripture, holding for them the greatest meaning.

"Set me as a seal upon thine heart, as a seal upon thine arm, etc."

How do they do it?

Listen.

First you get a small Bible. Then you get a door key and one-half yard of red twine. You open the Bible at the eighth chapter of Solomon's songs and lay the key within the Bible so that the round part of the key comes out over the side of the Holy book, and the other end just touches the word "heart." Then you close the book and wrap it with the red twine. Then two girls support the book suspended by placing the tip of the third finger of the left hand under the round part of the key, never touching the book. A third person repeats the alphabet, A, B, C, and so on, and the key twists the Bible around whenever the letter is reached which spells the name of the "husband who is to be." The while one must be repeating the verse quoted above.

Last Sunday in the Eta Bita Pie sorority, three maids perched on the davenport in the living room. One was grave as an owl, for it was "her" fortune that was to be told.

"A, B, C, D, E, F, G," tolled off the maid slowly, and the book hung suspended, motionless. "H" droned the maid, and, whiz, the key fairly turned itself out of the girl's hands.

"He-he-he" giggled the maids and tried it again. In turn came the rest of the name "omer," and as each letter was told off, there were more "hes, hes, hes, hes." Then began the last name, and letter after letter it spelled it out, but by that time it had grown too serious a thing to be giggled over.

Boys Bat Revenge On Girl Teachers

ST. LOUIS.—Eight young women of the Hawthorne school in East St Louis, who have been teaching the young idea how to shoot, attempted the other day to show how to play baseball.

There is a dispute as to whether they succeeded, the teachers maintaining they were victorious by a "perfectly awful score," and the unabashed boy pupils declaring, "aw, dem biddies don't know nuttin' about de game." The fans gave the decision to the boys.

A quiet little rumor to the effect the teachers would appear in bloomers brought out hundreds of fans. After the women appeared in skirts the crowd showed a seemingly unjustified desire to kill the umpire the rest of the game.

Ross Crenshaw, pitcher for the boys, shocked and pained the women by throwing the ball over the plate just as hard as ever he could. The outfield lay down and rolled over when one of the women indignantly asked: "How in the world could anybody hit a little old round ball when you throw it real hard?"

The game lasted three innings. When one of the young women was called "out" at second base, her teammates were a unit in declaring the decision faulty, prejudiced, out of order, ungentlemanly and reversible. When the umpire gently inquired why they took that view of it, they answered "because."

He was up against it and allowed the runner to return to second. The game was called off at the end of the fourth inning because the women were afraid they would get hit with the ball—because their clothes were getting dusty—because they were tired, and—because.

SUNBEAM. . . . MINN

WHOM WE CALL MERE MAN.

An average man of 150 pounds contains the constituents found in 1,200 eggs. There is enough gas in him to fill a gasometer of 3,649 cubic feet. He contains enough iron to make four tenpenny nails. His fat would make seventy-five candles and a good sized cake of soap. His phosphate content would make 8,064 boxes of matches. There is enough hydrogen in him in combination to fill a ballroom and carry him above the clouds. The remaining constituents of a man would yield, if utilized, six teaspoonfuls of salt, a bowl of sugar and ten gallons of water. A man has 500 muscles, 1,000,000,000 cells, 200 different bones, four gallons of blood, several hundred feet of arteries and veins, more than twenty-five feet of intestines, and millions of pores. His heart weighs from eight to twelve ounces, its capacity from four to six ounces in each ventricle, and its size is 5 by 3½ by 2½ inches. It is a hollow, muscular organ, and pumps twenty-two and one-half pounds of blood every minute. In twenty-four hours the heart pumps sixteen tons. It beats about seventy-two times a minute. In one year an average man's heart pumps 11,680,000 pounds of blood. The heart is a willing slave, but it sometimes strikes—and it always wins.

Commenting on the cost of books, a Harvard man remarks that while modern reprints of standard literary works can be obtained at moderate prices, volumes of more strictly contemporaneous interest are now habitually held at an unduly high price. As a consequence college students and others of moderate means are deterred from owning, aside from prescribed textbooks, such volumes as they need most, says the Rochester Post-Express. It is explained that with the exception of a prospective "best seller," or school textbook, the publisher argues that no more than, say, 3,000 copies could be sold, however low the price, whereas there are at least 800 municipal and collegiate libraries, which "must have" a copy; and it will be better business, in his opinion, to sell 800 copies at $5 each than 3,000 copies at $1.25. Size of type, page, margins and thickness of binding do much toward giving the appearance of value. It is also observed that the publisher does not overlook in his calculations the wealthy amateur who is "completing" his collection on a certain topic.

Wild game birds are the property of all citizens, under the Roman and continental law. On this principle of common ownership the states of this country have enacted their laws. But what of birds that alight but a short time within one state, then fly to another, and to yet other states? Are they not the property of the people of the Union? Because no state cares for them, the migratory birds of the United States are going the way of the great auk, the passenger pigeon and the parrakeet, says the New York Times. William S. Saskell of the American Game Protection and Propagation association argued before the senate committee that, though the title to the migratory birds has never been adjudicated, common sense would suggest that it belongs to the federal government, and the authorities at Washington should give ample protection to this fast vanishing wild life.

The population of Ireland on April 2, 1911, was 4,381,951 persons, showing a decrease of 76,824 since 1910. An increase of 7 per cent. was shown in the province of Leinster and decreases in the other three provinces. The number of families in 1911 was 912,711, an increase of 2,455 since 1901, and the average number of persons per family was 4.8, against 4.9 in the earlier year. Belfast increased from 349,180 to 385,492 in the 10 years from 1901 to 1911; Dublin from 290,638 to 309,272 and Cork from 76,122 to 76,632. The emigrants leaving Irish ports numbered 30,572 in 1911, a decrease of 1,884 from the 1910 figures. Of these 16,671 were male and 13,902 females. Most of the emigrants went to the United States and Canada, the former taking more than half of the total.

PLEADS FOR DELAY

GREAT BRITAIN'S REQUEST TO HALT CANAL BILL IS REFUSED BY UNITED STATES.

CLAIMS VIOLATION OF TREATY

Provisions Favoring American Coastwise Vessels and Barring Railroad Owned Ships Result in Complaint to State Department.

Washington, July 12.—Great Britain has requested that the enactment of the Panama canal administration bill be held in abeyance until Mitchell Innes, the British charge, can present a note in behalf of his government. This move confronts congress and the state department with an extraordinary situation, but is likely to have little effect in delaying the passage of the canal bill, according to leading senators.

The request for delay has been communicated to the senate interoceanic canals committee. It came from the summer embassy at Kineo, Me., and was sent by Mr. Innes, acting for Ambassador Bryce, who is in New Zealand.

While the reasons for the request are not stated in the charge's note, there is no doubt that the British government is concerned in the clause to grant free passage through the canal to American vessels in coastwise trade, and that relating to the passage of railroad-owned ships. The Canadian railways are deeply concerned in both, and it is thought that some of the representations will be made in their behalf.

The canal bill is now in the senate committee, with the prospect of being reported soon, and will then go to conference with the house. Congressmen at both ends of the capitol feel that if any Panama legislation is to be had it must be at this session of congress. The exigencies which have arisen by the necessary reductions of the working force as the canal approaches completion, make legislation necessary if a permanent organization is to be set up in the canal zone to the best advantage. It was said here that members of both houses were not agreeable to much delay now.

One of the provisions in the bill as it now stands would make it impossible for Canadian railroad ships to pass through the canal if they engaged in coastwise trade. Then the question of free tolls to certain classes of American ships involves the old question of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty.

It is believed that the British government will hold that ships of all nations must be on an equal basis. The opinion among many American statesmen is that to grant free tolls to American ships is not a violation of the terms of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty.

It seems certain that any representations the British government may make will be supported by Germany and France and perhaps other European powers. The matter of moment is how far those powers may go to sustain a protest against the proposed control of the Panama canal by the United States.

JACKSON WINS RACE

VICTORY IN 1,500-METER EVENT SENSATION OF OLYMPIAD.

P. J. McDonald of Irish-American A. C., Makes New Record for Weight Putters.

Stockholm, July 12.—The 1,500-meter flat race Wednesday at the Olympic games furnished one of the greatest thrills of the meeting. A harder struggle has seldom been seen on the cinder path. Melvin W. Shepard, I. A. A. C., drew the inside place for the start, with H. A. Arnaud, France; John Paul Jones, Cornell; Oscar F. Hedlund, Boston A. A., and A. N. S. Jackson, England, in the order named.

The race in the last 100 yards was a magnificent one. Until the leaders were within ten yards of the tape the event might have belonged either to Jackson or Abel Kiviat, Irish-American A. C.

A new Olympic record was created by P. J. McDonald of the Irish-American A. C., with his put of 15 meters 34 centimeters (a shade over 50 feet 4 inches) in the final of the weight-putting. The old Olympic record of 47 feet 7 inches, made by Ralph Rose in 1904, also was exceeded by Rose himself, who put the weight 15 meters 25 centimeters (a fraction over 50 feet).

There were four Americans in the field of twenty-one competitors, and not one of the seventeen came within sight of them except the brawny Finn, E. Niklander, who put 13 meters 36 centimeters. L. A. Whitney, Boston A. A., beat this by putting 13 meters, 93 centimeters.

Following is the standing of all countries competing in the Olympic games that have won ten points or more to Wednesday in all divisions of the contests: United States, 72; Sweden, 56; Great Britain, 45; France, 19; Germany, 17; Finland, 17; South Africa, 11; Denmark, 10.

CHAIRMAN IS NAMED

NATIONAL PROHIBITION CONVENTION SELECT OREGON LAWYER FOR OFFICE.

STRONG FIGHT FOR PLACE

Virgil G. Hinshaw Is Elected on Fifth Ballot—Platform Prepared by the Resolution Committee Is Adopted—Mainly Progressives in Features.

Atlantic City, N. J., July 13.—Under the amendment introduced permitting the filling of that office by a blind vote of the delegates on the floor, Virgil G. Hinshaw, a young lawyer of Oregon, was elected chairman of the national Prohibition convention here Thursday night.

This is the most desirable office within the gift of the party. It carries an annual salary of $3,000 and the practical administration of party affairs between national convention and national convention.

The fight for this office threatened for a time to split the Prohibitionists wide open. The race from the first day has been between three candidates, Charles R. Jones, former national chairman, representing the standpat element; W. C. Calderwood, representing the insurgents, and Hinshaw, representing the compromise element.

The Hinshaw victory came on the fifth ballot after both Jones and Calderwood had withdrawn from the race. His victory was later made unanimous.

Another official act of the convention was the adoption of the party platform prepared by the majority of the resolutions committee. This platform, besides taking the usual fall out of the liquor traffic, advocates most of the progressive principles embraced by the Roosevelt political school.

The important planks in the Prohibition party platform as adopted by the resolutions committee, are as follows:

1. Direct election of United States senator. A presidential term of six years, and one term only.
2. A uniform marriage and divorce law, the extermination of polygamy and the complete suppression of the white slave traffic.
3. Suffrage for women on the same terms as men.
4. Court review of post office decisions.
5. The absolute protection of the rights of labor without impairment of the rights of capital.
6. The settlement of all international disputes by arbitration.
7. The initiative and referendum, without the recall.
8. The tariff is a commercial question and should be fixed scientifically on the basis of accurate knowledge secured by means of a permanent, nonpartisan tariff commission, with ample powers.
9. An elastic currency system adequate to our expanding industrial needs.
10. Complete separation of church and state and opposition to appropriation of public funds for any sectarian purposes.
11. Abolition of child labor in mines, workshops and factories with rigid enforcement of the laws now "flagrantly violated."
12. Equitable graduated income and inheritance taxes.

Los Angeles, July 12.—Judge Hutton announced on Wednesday after the close of the morning session of the Darrow trial that Deputy Martin Aguirre would be relieved as custodian of the Darrow jury. He said the deputy had asked to be removed and that this was the sole reason for the change. The judge asserted that the members of the jury had been questioned and said that Aguirre had never uttered an expression of prejudice in favor of Darrow in their presence.

IOWA REBUKES MEET

VOTER FREE TO PICK OWN CANDIDATE FOR PRESIDENT.

After State Convention New Party Boomers Plan to Send Delegates to Chicago.

Des Moines, Ia., July 13.—Col. Theodore Roosevelt won a victory in Iowa on Wednesday. The Taft administration and the managers of the recent national convention at Chicago were rebuked by the Republican state convention.

Republicans of Iowa were left free to vote for either President Taft or Colonel Roosevelt next November by the action of the delegates. The matter was left to the voter and the platform, containing a direct attack upon the legality of the Chicago convention, was adopted by an overwhelming vote.

Despite a hard struggle, led by Gov. B. F. Carroll, a Taft adherent, to secure the indorsement of the national platform, the amendment offered by Iowa's executive containing this indorsement was laid on the table by a vote of 773 to 342.

Delegates from Iowa to the national progressive party convention in Chicago, August 5, will be named at a state convention to be held here on July 24. This plan was adopted at a meeting of the progressive delegates held after the adjournment of the state convention.

District conventions will be held at the same time as the state convention. In addition to naming delegates to Chicago and organizing a permanent state committee, the state convention will choose electors for the third party ticket.

A provisional state central committee was selected, the members of which will issue calls for county mass conventions.

NAME HILLES AS CHAIRMAN

Taft Aid Chosen Chief of the Republican National Committee.

Washington, July 11.—President Taft's secretary, Charles D. Hilles, was chosen chairman of the Republican national committee, and James B. Reynolds of Massachusetts, a member of the tariff board, was made secretary Tuesday. These selections were made by the nine members of the national committee acting as a sub-committee after conference with President Taft. Chairman Hilles and the full national committee will meet Friday, July 19, at the Waldorf-Astoria in New York to appoint a treasurer, other officers, an executive committee and an advisory committee.

Headquarters of the national committee are to be opened in New York the first of next week. They probably will be in the Metropolitan Life building, the same as four years ago. The opening of a middle west headquarters at Chicago and a Pacific coast headquarters at Portland, Ore., was considered at the meeting of the subcommittee and practically decided upon.

Receipts for Democratic Campaign of 1904 "Not Worth While," He Testifies to Senate Committee.

Washington, July 11.—"When we got through it was not worth while," replied Thomas Taggart, chairman of the Democratic national committee in 1904, when asked by the senate campaign expenditure committee Tuesday if he ever figured up the receipts and expenditures of his committee during the Parker campaign.

Mr. Taggart swore that the treasurer's books came into his possession just before the Denver convention in 1908 and that he burned them and "other dead matter" before turning over the organization records to Norman E. Mack, the new chairman, in 1908.

SOLACE IN HIS MISFORTUNE

Entombed Miner Had at Least One Pleasant Thought After Two Days of Suffering.

Miners are among the most heroic people in the world. Danger is always beside them, and they are schooled to believe that any time they will come face to face with death. The result of this is that they are humorous in their boldness.

In one of the mines of Pennsylvania there was a cave-in which imprisoned a miner named Jack Thornton. The accident happened on Friday afternoon, and the fellow laborers of the entombed man set to work at once to dig him out. It was not until Sunday morning, however, that they reached his prison chamber, and by this time they were wondering whether he had been suffocated or starved to death. One of them stuck his head through the aperture made by the picks of the rescuers and called out:

"Jack, are you all right?"

"All right," came the reply, and then after a pause: "What day is this?"

"Sunday!" exclaimed the friend.

"Gee!" exclaimed Jack, "I'm glad of that. That was one Saturday night when those saloonkeepers didn't get my wages."—Popular Magazine.

She Was a Duster.

Mrs. Sutton advertised for a woman to do general housework, and in answer a colored girl called, announcing that she had come for the position.

"Are you a good cook?" asked Mrs. Sutton.

"No, indeed, I don't cook," was the reply.

"Are you a good laundress?"

"I wouldn't do washin' and ironin'; it's too hard on the hands.

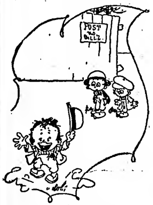
"Can you sweep?" asked Mrs. Sutton.

"No," was the positive answer, "I'm not strong enough."

"Well," said the lady of the house, quite exasperated, "may I ask what you can do?"

"I dusts," came the placid reply.—Everybody's.

JUST CAUSE FOR PRIDE.



POST NO BILLZ.

"Wot's he so tickled about?"

"He's jest discovered his birthday's on de same day as Ad Wolgast's!"

Deliberating.

The Rev. James Hamilton, minister of Liverpool, while on holiday in Scotland, had a narrow escape from drowning. Accompanied by a boy, Mr. Hamilton was fishing for sea trout when he slipped on a stone, lost his balance, and being encumbered with heavy wading boots, had great difficulty in keeping his head above water. Finally he managed to get back to the shore, although in a very exhausted state, and said to the boy: "I noticed that you never tried to help me." "Na," was the deliberate response, "but I was thinkin' o't."

It makes a girl awfully ashamed to let a man kiss her without first putting up some sort of a bluff.

When God calls, the safest step we can take is straight ahead.

SALLOW FACES

Often Caused by Tea and Coffee Drinking.

How many persons realize that tea and coffee so disturb digestion that they produce a muddy, yellow complexion?

A ten days' trial of Postum has proven a means, in thousands of cases, of clearing up a bad complexion.

A Washn. young lady tells her experience:

"All of us—father, mother, sister and brother—had used tea and coffee for many years until finally we all had stomach troubles, more or less.

"We all were sallow and troubled with pimples, had breath, disagreeable taste in the mouth, and all of us simply so many bundles of nerves.

"We didn't realize that tea and coffee caused the trouble until one day we ran out of coffee and went to borrow some from a neighbor. She gave us some Postum and told us to try that.

"Although we started to make it, we all felt sure that we would be sick if we missed our strong coffee, but we tried Postum and were surprised to find it delicious.

"We read the statements on the pkg., got more and in a month and a half you wouldn't have known us. We all were able to digest our food without any trouble, each one's skin became clear, tongues cleared off, and nerves in fine condition. We never use anything now but Postum. There is nothing like it." Name given by Postum Co., Battle Creek, Mich.

"There's a reason," and it is explained in the little book, "The Road to Wellville," in pkgs.

Beth's Vacation

BY

CONSTANCE BREVOORT

(Copyright, 1912, by Associated Literary Press.)

The train started on its winding way among the hills. Beth Tilton pressed her pretty nose against the car window to wave a last farewell at her mother and younger sister on the station platform.

At last their forms faded from view and Beth leaned back tired with the preparations for this long-anticipated vacation—almost fearful that she would awake to find it a dream after all.

Beth had been saving money for three years to take a few weeks' vacation from the office where she worked; but each year had seen the money diverted to some other necessary object and Beth had spent her vacations at home.

But this year had proved to be an exception. She had heard of a pleasant farmhouse tucked away among the Litchfield hills and she had written and engaged board for four weeks. Now, she was actually on her way there. Her trunk was in the baggage car and her well-filled suitcase was beside her in the coach. From her arm dangled a leather handbag containing her money—fifty dollars—and her trunk check.

Three hours passed before the train reached the little red painted station which marked Beth's destination. She arose and made her way with difficulty past the stout woman who had occupied more than half of her seat and who made no attempt to arise when the train stopped.

Beth was the only passenger at Red station and she saw her trunk bounced from the baggage car to the platform as the train moved on.

The station agent came out and looked curiously at the pretty girl with the wide, expectant eyes that could not see enough in that first glimpse of the rolling hills, the stately trees, the flash of bird wings in the thickets and the multitudinous sounds of a warm midsummer day in the real country.

"I reckon you belong to this here trunk," remarked the man with a good-natured grin.

"Yes. I am going to Wellwood Farm—is there a stage or any kind of conveyance here?" Beth looked around as she spoke.

"The Wellwood wagon came up this morning after some boarders—Joe said he wouldn't come up again till the 6 o'clock train. You got some time to wait."

She Was Tired and Dusty.

"How far is it?"

"Oh, a couple of miles down the east road."

Beth looked at her watch. It was 3 o'clock. "I believe I will walk," she decided. "Will you please have my trunk put on the wagon when it comes tonight?" She opened her handbag and gave the man a quarter, and before she closed it again she noticed something unusual about it.

What was it? Her heart almost stopped beating as she realized that the little chamois bag containing her cherished fifty dollars had disappeared.

For a dazed instant she tried to recall when it might have been taken. There had been just one opportunity. She had felt a sudden tug at the bag during her journey, and had disentangled it from the fringes of the stout woman's gown. The woman had helped her with great amiability.

Her money was gone—her vacation was gone, too. The change in her little purse would not buy her return ticket to New York. She decided to walk down to Wellwood farm and write home to her father for money to return home.

The walk to the farm was most unhappy for poor Beth. She was tired and dusty and very warm when she reached the gates. It did not add to her self-possession to see the shady porches filled with daintily gowned women and the tennis courts gay with young men and girls.

This was the reason why Beth chose to enter the wide carriage gate and keep on around to the kitchen door, where a tired-looking woman in a neat gingham dress was churning.

"Oh, here you are at last!" she cried in a relieved tone. "I'm sorry you had to walk all the way—you must be tired. Joe didn't wait for the 3 o'clock train. He thought if you didn't come at noon you wouldn't be here till night, and I was wondering how I was going to get supper without you."

Beth stared aghast at this reception. It was evident that Mrs. Marsh had mistaken her for some other expected person. In a few words she explained who she was and the disaster that had befallen her finances.

"I'm awful sorry, Miss Tilton," said Mrs. Marsh when Beth had finished her story, "and it seems too bad that you have to lose your vacation after all—if it was out of the season I'd tell you to stay any way, but we're crowded, of course, and every room is engaged. I can rent yours tomorrow."

"Of course I will pay you for the day or so I shall remain," explained Beth.

"My land—I wish you was a waitress—I'm so short of help," bemoaned Mrs. Marsh, suddenly turning to a subject that appeared to be on her mind. "Annie Brian left yesterday and I sent to Beechmont for another girl, and I've been expecting her by every train. To tell you the truth, I thought you was one."

"Wouldn't I do?" asked Beth.

"You wouldn't want, though it's honest work, Miss Tilton," said Mrs. Marsh, eagerly.

"I'll do it," agreed Beth, "if you will allow me to spend every afternoon out of doors after I have finished my work. In that way I can pay for my vacation and get some good from it, too."

"That will suit me—now, what shall I call you?"

"You might call me Lizzie," smiled Beth. "I'm glad I brought plenty of plain cotton dresses along. If you will lend me some aprons I'll begin now."

"Not until you've rested. Annie's little room is clean and cool and you go lie down and rest till 5 o'clock. Drink a glass of buttermilk first and help yourself to cookies from the jar on the table there."

Thus Beth Tilton began her strange vacation, which was half work. She did not write home to her family and tell them of her loss and how the vacation money had vanished after all. They would be disappointed—they had all helped to get her off. She wrote of the pleasant people who were stopping there, of the games of tennis and croquet, of the fishing in the lake, the long tramps over hill and dale and of long afternoons which she spent in a hammock under the apple trees in the orchard.

She told them about Bruce Maynard, who was stopping at Wellwood Farm for a few weeks. She mentioned what he had said to her in many interesting conversations held under the apple trees, but she did not tell them that some of the feminine boarders were shocked at his attentions to the pretty young waitress and how she had at last been obliged to avoid him.

Then one day Bruce Maynard went away and life at the farm became very dull for Beth, but she continued to be the best waitress that Mrs. Marsh had ever employed and she was well liked and courteously treated by all the boarders.

At last came the first of September and with it witnessed the departure of the last boarder. Mrs. Marsh insisted upon Beth assuming her proper name and position. The cook was able to manage all the work now and there followed a week of idleness.

She had paid her way and had money in the handbag to pay her way home, and yet she was not quite happy. Life could never be the same to her after meeting Bruce Maynard. If fate had been kinder she would have met him under more favorable conditions and there might have followed something more lasting.

The night before she was to leave for New York Bruce Maynard came back. He found Mrs. Marsh sitting alone on the front porch.

"I've come back to marry your waitress, Lizzie Tilton," he said bluntly. "Where is she?"

"She's gone," smiled Mrs. Marsh demurely. "In her place is Miss Beth Tilton—who really came here to board with me, but took a waitress' position because she had her pocket picked on the train—"

"Where is she?" insisted Maynard just as if he had not heard her explanation.

"I believe she is watching the sunset from the orchard fence—"

But before Mrs. Marsh could complete the sentence Bruce Maynard had darted around the corner of the house and disappeared.

Good Taste, for Example.

Good taste is the finest flower of the times in which it grows. Only a few years ago some of us thought brutal, atrocious, aye, cruel, horse play funny, calling it "practical" jokes. And now today we still have among us some who think a cat or dog or man fight the height of joy and gayety. It takes fine times and finest peoples to make good taste. Good taste is a true good understanding of due limits in speech, acts and manners. Where good taste is used by men in influence and authority it prevents many scandalous and silly doings.

SHOOTS WIFE AND TAKES OWN LIFE

WOMAN, WHO MAY RECOVER, TRIES FRANTICALLY TO OPEN DOOR AND ESCAPE.

CHILDREN MISS TRAGEDY

Husband, Believed Temporarily Insane, Had Threatened Suicide—Man Was Cripple.

Minneapolis. — Mr. William Phipps, a cripple, who shot and wounded his wife, possibly fatally, and then killed himself at their home in Wayzata, after she had asked him to go into the kitchen and pick over some currants. Phipps was believed by physicians and neighbors to have been demented at the time.

The woman was striving desperately to unlatch the door of a screened-in front porch and escape when her husband, who had pursued her from the kitchen through their house to the porch, opened fire. Two shots went wild, the third striking Mrs. Phipps beside the right shoulder and passing through her body into the chest cavity.

Two young daughters, who had left the house to go berry picking a few moments earlier, barely escaped being witnesses of the tragedy. When they heard the shots they hurried home to find neighbors breaking in the screen door to reach their mother, who lay moaning on the porch. F. H. Snure, cashier of the Wayzata State bank, whose home is across the street, was the only eye witness of the shooting.

To make sure of his own death after his wife fell, Phipps ran back through the house, took a dose of carbolic acid and then shot himself through the head, dying instantly. Sheriff Otto Langum learned from neighbors that Phipps had been quarrelsome and that on Thanksgiving day, 1911, Harold Phipps, a 17-year-old son, had saved his mother when the cripple threatened her with a baseball bat.

William Phipps had been a cripple since he was struck by an automobile in Minneapolis more than a year ago. Recently he had discarded his crutches and had made a scant living hobbling about Wayzata on two canes, peddling stockings.

In a brief verbal statement made to a neighbor before she lost consciousness after the shooting, Mrs. Phipps told the bare details of the shooting. She said her husband throughout breakfast today had been kinder to her than for weeks. When breakfast was finished about 7 a. m. the two daughters, Helen, aged 12, and Arvilla, aged 15, started berry picking. They had hardly left the house when, according to Mrs. Phipps' story, her husband kindly asked her what he could do for her to make the day's housework easier.

"You might go into the kitchen and pick over those currants," she replied.

WHY MEAT IS HIGH.

Livestock Inspector Blames It to Slaughter of Young Calves.

Duluth.—"The cause that has been raising and continues to raise the price of beef and make it scarce is the slaughtering of young calves," said Marcus Ballanger, government live stock inspector, here. "There are 8,000,000 young calves being killed every spring that average about seventy pounds apiece. If allowed to grow another year they would average 500 pounds each, which means that there would be 440,000,000 pounds of beef added to the supply.

"But suppose we had a law like Argentina, which prohibits the killing of female bovine until they are seven years of age. Porterhouse steak would cease to be a luxury. Beef is high because it is scarce."

Much Damage in Redwood County.

Redwood Falls.—Lightning attending a thunder storm and shower here did considerable damage to stock and property throughout Redwood county. Several cows and horses were killed. A house on the Melges farm was damaged together with a large barn about three miles southwest of this city. The high wind which accompanied the storm blew down several windmills and other buildings.

Illinois Woman Killed Under Auto.

Mabel.—Mrs. Will Scanlon of Peoria, Ill., was killed and her husband injured when their automobile ran off a culvert and turned turtle. Mrs. Scanlon was pinned beneath the machine and died in a few minutes. The accident happened about six miles from here, near Burr Oak, Iowa. They were traveling from Dorchester, Iowa, Mrs. Scanlon's former home, to Mason City.

Elevator Files Bankruptcy Schedules.

Fergus Falls. — Lang, Atwood & White, engaged in the flour mill and elevator business at Evansville, filed schedules in bankruptcy in the federal court in this city. The schedules place the firm's assets at $14,650.85, and liabilities at $26,225.10. In the individual schedules Mr. Lang places his assets at $12,364, of which $2,495.74 is exempt, and his liabilities at $10,699.66. Mr. Atwood places his assets at $3,395, of which $595 is exempt, and his liabilities at $13,567.37. Mr. White files no schedules.

POTATO CROP SHOWS GAIN

CENSUS OF FIELDS INDICATES MINN. YIELD BOOSTED 20 PER CENT.

Douglas Has 128 Per Cent More—Vast Acreage Has Been Planted.

St. Paul. — According to reports received by the immigration commissioner, H. J. Maxfield, from his fieldmen throughout the state, Minnesota is to have one of the largest potato crops in its history. The estimates from 28 counties show increases of from 5 to over 100 per cent. An estimate of the average increase in yield is 20 per cent, according to the report.

Minnesota raised 26,000,000 bushels of potatoes last year and an increase of 20 per cent means approximately 5,000,000 bushels. If the prices are as high this year as last, the farmers will pocket more than $2,500,000. Although the increase is due largely to the increase of acreage on account of the high prices of last year, Mr. Maxfield says the production this year is much better than last year.

Hennepin county shows an increase of over 25 per cent over last year. D. E. Ryan says that there are from 2,500,000 to 3,000,000 bushels of potatoes shipped from Hennepin County this year. Douglas county, according to the report, shows the largest increase, 128 per cent. Ramsey county shows up well with an increase in yield of 100 per cent.

MINN. MAN DEFEATED.

Prohibitionists Pick Oregonian as National Chairman.

Atlantic City, New Jersey. — After a day of almost constant wrangling, interspersed now and then with hymns and prayers, the national Prohibition convention overthrew the existing administration and elected G. Hinshaw of Portland, Ore., as national chairman of the party. The convention voted down a proposed plank in the platform demanding that the separation of church and state be perpetual and that no public money should be appropriated to sectarian churches and schools. Adjournment was then taken and at the next session candidates for president and vice president will be nominated.

Mr. Hinshaw the new national chairman of the party, was a compromise selection as between Charles R. Jones of Illinois, the present chairman and W. C. Calderwood of Minnesota, the leading insurgent candidate for the office.

WOMAN SAVED BY MIRACLE.

Minneapolis. — Mrs. Edward Orbeck had a marvelous escape from instant death or, at least, mutilation, when she was struck by a switch engine on the Milwaukee tracks at Fifth street and Thirteenth avenue south. She was crossing the tracks and her clothing was caught by the engine as she jumped to one side. She was dragged against the front wheels, but thrown out again before the wheels ran over her. It is possible that she was injured internally.

Third Party Call Is Ready.

St. Paul. — The new, or third party state convention will be held in the St. Paul Auditorium July 30, and will be in the form of a monster mass meeting. Delegates to the national convention to be held in Chicago August 5 will be elected, and presidential electors will also be recommended. Milton D. Purdy will make public the call within a day or two. This call will be signed by Mr. Purdy, Hugh T. Halbert of St. Paul and by leading Progressives throughout the state.

Old Mill Destroyed.

Verndale.—Rye, corn and potatoes suffered from hail and a high wind blew down fences and trees around town. The old grist mill on the river was struck by lightning and burned. It contained valuable machinery and the loss is placed at $5,000, with no insurance. It was owned by K. Bagne of Mahnomen. Four inches of water fell.

Elevators Burn at Randolph.

Cannon Falls.—Both elevators and the lumber yard at Randolph, with offices and other buildings, were burned with a loss of $8,000. Randolph has no fire protection, water pressure or apparatus. Had the wind not changed soon after the fire was discovered the town might have been destroyed. Both properties were insured.

Lad Shoots Young Companion.

Bemidji.—Henry Austin, 12 years old, of Northolms, is dying in the hospital here as the result of a rifle bullet wound inflicted by a younger companion while at play in the woods. The shooting was accidental. The boy who did the shooting did not know the 22 rifle which he aimed at Henry was loaded.

Doeffler Gets Life Sentence.

Red Wing.—Jake Doeffler, murderer of Mr. and Mrs. Anton Schill, was sentenced to imprisonment at hard labor for life. Max Decker, who pleaded guilty to a statutory offense, was sentenced to six months in the county jail. Fred Boeckler, indicted on the same charge as Decker, was sentenced to the state reformatory at St. Cloud. Joseph McAdams, charged with breaking into a boxcar and stealing merchandise, had his case continued.

MIDNIGHT STORM HITS FERGUS FALLS

BUILDINGS UNROOFED, WALLS TWISTED AND TREES UPROOTED BY HIGH WIND.

LOSSES REACH $150,000

Crops in the Vicinity Heavily Damaged—Electric Light Service Crippled—No Fatalities Reported.

Fergus Falls. — storm of tornadic proportions and power struck here soon after midnight. The damage to buildings and other property is conservatively estimated at $50,000 and the damage in country districts immediately adjacent amounts to $100,000 or more.

The storm followed the true tornadic course, coming from the southwest and going northeast. Reports indicate that it extended not farther than four miles north, and just how far west has not yet been determined. A Barnesville dispatch indicates that the chief force of the disturbance was spent in this vicinity.

The principal losses in the city were to the furniture store of Martin Benson, the Grand hotel, the Fergus Falls Co-operative Creamery company's building and the clothing store of Olaf Schei. Benson's loss is anywhere between $5,000 and $10,000, his building being badly battered and his stock of goods drenched by rain. The walls of the Grand hotel, Fergus Falls' principal hostelry, were so twisted by the shock of the wind that it is believed they can never be repaired. The largest individual loss was on this building.

One end of the creamery building was torn out and most of its windows and doors broken in. This is a $7,000 brick building.

The roof of the clothing store of Olaf Schei was partially crushed by falling brick from adjacent buildings, and all the goods were heavily damaged by the heavy rain that accompanied the blow.

No one in the city or country was injured, so far as known, except by flying glass, as the windows were blown in. One and a half inches of rain fell in an hour.

Hundreds of trees were tore up by the roots and many fell across the streets and effectually blocked them against traffic. Telephone and electric lighting poles were leveled in all parts of the city and there will be no street lights for several nights.

Reports of losses in country districts have been coming all day. On each farm in the path of the wind comes the same story of minor destruction. Barns were either wrecked or torn to pieces and crops of all kinds were leveled with the soil.

Bad Storms Over State.

Minneapolis. — Electrical storms accompanied by heavy downpours of rain and cyclonic winds, are reported from many towns of the state. A cyclone is reported near Albert Lea, but the amount of damage and whether any lives were lost are unknown. Two empty freight cars were blown from Wadena onto a side track at Verndale by the high wind. Buildings in and around Bertha, Minn., were wrecked. La Crosse, Lytle and Holmes, Wis., report severe storms. Basements were flooded and wires put out of commission in Albert Lea. Considerable damage was done at Luverne, and Bemidji reports a cloudburst. Rochester had the heaviest storm of the season. Austin reports a bad electrical storm and much damage.

Warm Weather in Demand.

Minneapolis. — According to the agricultural experts, grain men and others interested in the crop outlook two weeks of warm weather are all that is needed to insure splendid crop returns in the Northwest. They say hot weather for about ten days would add almost as many million dollars to the crop values of the grain growing belt of Minnesota, the Dakotas and other grain producing territories. "Hot weather from now on would be of immense value," said Dean Woods of the agricultural college.

X-Ray Used to Find Bullet.

Minneapolis. — Physicians at St. Barnabas hospital begun probing for the bullet which struck Mrs. Helen Phipps when she was seriously wounded by her husband, William Phipps, who later ended his own life, in their home at Wayzata. An x-ray photograph of the wound was taken at the hospital. The woman was shot in the back as she was trying to escape from her husband, who is believed to have been insane. The condition of Mrs. Phipps is said at the hospital not to be as serious as was at first reported.

Buys Woolen Mills at St. Peter.

St. Peter. — J. C. Brinker of La Crosse, Wis., has bought the St. Peter woolen mills. Mayor Edward Bornemann sold out his entire interest in the plant, and has turned it over to the new proprietor. Mr. Brinker will build an addition to the factory, and will install a carload of new machinery, which he has purchased at Des Moines. Included in the consignment will be a large spinning machine, and the mill's operations will be materially increased.

FOR SCIATIC RHEUMATISM

Try the Treatment That Cured This Pronounced Case in Minneapolis After Other Treatments Failed.

Sciatica is neuralgia of the sciatic nerve. Its origin is generally rheumatic and is the direct result of taking cold. For this reason the disease is commonly known as "sciatic rheumatism." That Dr. Williams' Pink Pills cure this disease is shown by numerous cases like that of Mrs. J. B. Hansen, of No. 221 Twentieth Ave., So., Minneapolis, Minn. She says:

"A few years ago following an attack of the grip I was taken with sciatica. For six years I suffered untold agony and thought it would be a blessing to me if I could only die. There were sharp, shooting pains in both of my limbs and my shoulders and arms were affected also but not so severely. If I moved about quickly, the pain would catch me so that I had to scream. My limbs would swell until I could hardly walk. I also had a terrible dull pain in my back which was often unbearable. I was confined to bed for a week or two at a time. While suffering from the sciatica I was further run-down by weakness common to women of my age.

"I received so little relief from the doctor's medicine that I became discouraged and quit it. My husband urged me to try Dr. Williams' Pink Pills as he had read how they had cured cases like mine. I felt better after I had taken the pills a short time but took several boxes until I was certain I was cured. I give this statement of my cure thinking that other sufferers may be helped as I was through using Dr. Williams' Pink Pills."

The tonic treatment with Dr. Williams' Pink Pills succeeds where other treatments fail because it is based on the sound medical principle that the health of the nerves depends on pure, red blood.

Every person who is interested in the home treatment of nervous disorders should send for a new edition of our booklet entitled, "Diseases of the Nervous System, Their Nature, Symptoms and Treatment." Address the Dr. Williams Medicine Co., Schenectady, N. Y.

Dr. Williams' Pink Pills are for sale at all druggists, or will be mailed to any address, postpaid, on receipt of price, 50 cents per box; six boxes for $2.50, by the Dr. Williams Medicine Company, Schenectady, N. Y

THE SUNBEAM.

BY W. G. HUNT.

Published every Friday, at Sunbeam, Pennington County, Minnesota.

Did you ever kick over an old stump containing an ants nest, then stand and watch the ants each pick up an egg and start in different directions? If you have you have seen a fair illustration of the Republican party of to day. The nomination of Taft can not now be helped, but the party had warnings enough that it would not do and now let them take the consequences, for the people will speak in November, and they will straighten matters out proper. The country has not gone to the dogs and don't you ever think it, because some politician who is after office tells you so, for the people have their turn at the bat in November and they will retire Taft proper.

The republican party has been placed in the position in this state of being ashamed of their National leader. But this does not and should not affect the other offices below the president. The people have shown on numerous occasions that they know how to vote without any extra instructions, and they have not forgotten how to do it this year. Look at the election of Governor Johnson twice and the rest of the ticket Republican. Does that not show that the people know how to vote and do not propose to have a man elected to any office because he has a party name that they do not want? Sit down and take it easy some of you would be great leaders and the people will straigten this tangle out next November.

WARM POLITICS.

Sam Y. Gordon has cut loose from the Taft gang in proper style. When asked what he thought of the movement to make Roosevelt a candidate for President, he had the following to say:

"When thievery is committed, politically or otherwise, the culprits should be brought to book, and I believe in a call for a State convention of progressive Republicans and other voters who wish to affiliate with them, to take such action as may be deemed best to effectively rebuke the men in charge of the machinery of the Republican National Convention at Chicago, whereby honestly elected delegates were unseated and the will of the Republican voters thwarted by dictation of the bosses. The time for the masses within the party to revolt and flatly refuse to be driven, is now, and regardless of consequences as effecting my own political aspirations, I take this stand. If the Republican party of this State wallows in the mire prepared for it at Chicago it will die of its own stench. I believe in washing the linen right now. Within our own State we should stand solidly together on all local tickets and at the same time join hands in purging the party of the deadly weight thrust upon it by the national organization. I cannot concur in the recommendations of Mr. E. T. Young that progressive Republicans support the Democratic nominee for President, as such candidate and his party do not fully represent their political views. Theodore Roosevelt has cut deep into the heart and marrow of corruption in public matters. He has braved the storm when others have faltered and feared to stir. As result of his courage and activity in behalf of his countrymen, he stands eminently alone in his leadership of their cause to a point, where at least public servants in the nation must truly represent the people or retire. He has ferreted out and driven from power more political parasites than all the rest of us put together, and I hope that he becomes the progressive Republican candidate for the Presidency."

We do not agree with all of Mr. Gordons ideas in the above but it is useless to try to affect any republican organization in this state this year, as, The LaFollette followers are more bitter against Roosevelt than they are Taft.

You had better sit down, all you politician and let the people straighten out this tangle in November.

We wish to state for the benefit of our subscribers that all our present county officials are progressive republicans who opposed the nomination of Taft as bitter as we did.

Napoleon's Nicknames.

Napoleon Bonaparte had many nicknames, many of them bestowed in admiration and devotion by his soldiers, such as the playfully ironic "Little Corporal," while on the other side of the silver streak he was known by less complimentary sobriquets. "Old Boney" was then a bogy at the mention of whom more than merely children were terrified and grew pale, while many pious persons even believed that he was the "beast" mysteriously referred to in the book of Revelation under the name of "666," and many ingenious attempts were made to show that the letters of his name could be [illegible] into this number.—[illegible]

Boiling Potatoes.

There is a simple way to prevent potatoes from burning and sticking to the bottom of the pot. An inverted pie pan placed in the bottom of the pot avoids scorching potatoes. The water and empty space beneath the pan save the potatoes. This also makes the work of cleaning pots easier, as no adhering parts of potatoes are left to be scoured out.

The day for such primary election shall be the first day of registration in all election districts except in cities of the first class."

Sec. 2. That section 182 of the Revised Laws of 1905, be and the same is hereby amended so as to read as follows:

"Section 182. A political party, within the meaning of this chapter, is one which shall have maintained in the district or territorial division in question a party organization, and presented candidates for election at three or more biennial elections within the preceding ten years; or whose members, to a number equal to at least ten per cent of the total number of votes cast at the preceding general election in the county where the application is made, shall present to the auditor a petition for a place on the primary election ballot. Provided further, that all qualified and duly registered voters may participate in the choosing of candidates for city office as provided for in the city charter of cities having home rule charters; the names of all candidates for nomination for the offices of chief justice, associate justices of the supreme court, judges of the district, probate and municipal courts, county superintendents of schools and all municipal offices in cities of the first class shall be placed upon a separate primary ballot hereinafter designated as "Non-partisan Primary Ballot."

No party or other designation, except as above, shall be placed on such ballot except as herein provided, nor shall any candidate filing for nomination on said non-partisan primary ballot be permitted or required to state his party affiliation. All provisions of law relating to the nomination of party candidates as to the form of ballot, including rotation of names, the endorsements thereon, voting, marking ballots, counting, returning and canvassing results shall apply to nomination of said officers except that the tally sheets and returns shall be made separately. Each voter shall be entitled to vote a non-partisan primary ballot without reference to his party affiliation.

The two candidates for nomination for every such non-partisan office who shall receive the highest number of votes, ascertained as provided by this act, shall be declared the nominees and their names shall be placed upon the election ballot, without party designation, and when two or more persons are to be elected for the same office, at a general election running at large in a city, county, district or in this state, such offices shall be classified and numbered as hereinafter provided and the non-partisan nominees to be placed upon the general election ballot shall be the two candidates in each such class who shall receive the highest number of votes at such primary election, ascertained by the rules provided by this act, but nothing herein shall prevent the nomination of candidates by groups, individuals or so-called political parties which cannot be recognized as such, by certificate of voters to the number hereinafter specified. The officer preparing said ballot shall provide as many classes and numbers as there are offices at large to be filled. Every person when filing as a candidate for the nomination for any such office shall designate in his affidavit the number and class in which he desires to file and become a candidate and his name shall be placed on the ballot in such designated number and class. Such classes shall be rotated upon the ballots in the same manner as provided by law for the rotation of names of candidates.

Candidates, in any such case, who have filed for nomination prior to the passage of this act, shall designate to the proper officer within twenty days after the approval of this act, in which class they desire to be placed and such officer shall thereupon place the name of such candidates on the ballot in such designated class. If the mechanism of such machines will not permit the voter to record his vote in the manner provided in this act, said machines may be used in the manner now provided by law so far as is applicable, and as to offices to which such voting machines will not apply separate paper ballots conforming with the law shall be used. All votes on voting machines shall be recorded and counted and the results thereof ascertained, canvassed and returned as provided by this act.

Any person, who for the purpose of influencing the result of any primary or election, makes any bet or wager of anything of pecuniary value on the result of such primary or election, in his electoral district or any part thereof, or of any pending primary or election, or on any event or contingency relating thereto, shall be guilty of a violation of this act, and in addition thereto, any such act shall be a ground of challenge against his right to vote.

Sec. 13. It shall be unlawful for any person to pay another for any loss or damage due to attendance at the polls, or in registering. No person shall pay for personal service to be performed on the day of a caucus, primary, convention, or any election, for any purpose, connected therewith, tending in any way, directly or indirectly, to affect the result thereof, except for the hiring of persons whose sole duty it is to act as challenger and watch the count of official ballots. No person shall buy, sell, give or provide any political badges, buttons or other insignia to be worn at or about the polls on the day of any primary or election and no such political badge, button or other insignias shall be worn at or about the polls on any primary or election day. No person or committee, or organization shall convey or furnish any vehicle for conveying or bear any portion of any expense of conveying any voter to or from the polls, but this provision shall not apply to persons of the same household, nor shall it prohibit two or more voters from providing joint transportation for themselves by mutual agreement at their own expense.

Sec. 17. No personal campaign or party committee shall make any disbursement except:

Sec. 19. (1) Every candidate, and the secretary of every personal campaign and party committee shall, on the second Saturday occurring after such candidate or committee has first made a disbursement or first incurred any obligation, expressed or implied, to make a disbursement for political purposes, and thereafter, on the second Saturday of each calendar month, until all disbursements shall have been accounted for and also on the Saturday preceding any election or primary, file a financial statement verified upon the oath of such candidate or upon the oath of the secretary of such committee, as the case may be, which statement shall cover all transactions not accounted for and reported upon in statements theretofore filed. Each statement after the first shall contain a summary of all preceding statements, and summarize all items theretofore reported, under the provisions of this act.

The statement of every other party committee shall be filed in the office of the county auditor of the county within which, or for a subdivision within which such disbursements were made.

(3) Each statement shall give in full detail:

(e) Statements shall also be made by any other political committee showing the total amount of receipts and disbursements, and for what purpose such disbursements were made. Such statement shall be filed with the auditor of the county in which such committee has its headquarters within thirty days after any primary or election.

Sec. 20. Blanks for all statements required by this act shall be prepared by the secretary of state and copies thereof, together with a copy of this act, shall be furnished through the county auditor or otherwise, as the secretary of state may deem expedient, to the secretary of every committee, and to every candidate upon the filing of nomination papers, and to all other persons required by law to file such statements who may apply therefor.

Sec. 21. The name of a candidate chosen at a primary election or otherwise shall not be printed on the official ballot for the ensuing election, unless there has been filed by or on behalf of said candidate and by his personal campaign committee, if any, the statements of accounts and expenses relating to nominations required by this act.

Sec. 22. No person shall, in order to aid or promote his nomination or election, directly or indirectly, himself, or through any other person, appoint or promise to appoint any person, or secure or promise to secure or aid in securing the appointment, nomination or election of any person to any public or private position or employment, or to any position of honor, trust or emolument. Nothing herein contained, however, shall prevent a candidate from stating publicly his preference for or support of any other candidate for any office to be voted for at the same primary or election; nor prevent a candidate, for any office in which the person elected will be charged with the duty of participating in the election or the nomination of any person as a candidate for any office, from publicly stating or pledging his preference for or support of any person for such office or nomination.

Sec. 23. No person being an employer or acting for or in behalf of any employer shall give, distribute or cause to be given or distributed to any of his employes, any printed or written matter containing any threat, notice or information, or make any threat, verbal or otherwise, that in case any particular ticket or a political party or organization or candidate shall be elected or any measure referred to a vote of the people shall be adopted, work in his place or establishment will cease, in whole or in part, or his place of establishment will be closed up, or the salaries or wages of the workmen or employes be reduced or other threats, expressed or implied, intended or calculated to influence the political opinion or actions of his workmen or employes.

Sec. 24. Any candidate may delegate to his personal campaign committee or to any party committee of his party in writing duly subscribed by him, the expenditure of any portion of the total disbursements which are authorized to be incurred by him or on his behalf, by the provisions of this act but the total of all disbursements by himself and by his personal campaign committee in his behalf shall not exceed in the aggregate the amounts in this act specified, except as provided herein.

Sec. 25. (1) No disbursement shall be made and no obligation, expressed or implied, to make such disbursements, shall be incurred by or on behalf of any personal campaign committee, exceeding in the aggregate the total amounts theretofore delegated to such committee in writing, duly subscribed as provided herein.

(2) The state central committee of any political party entitled by law to have the names of its candidates placed upon the official ballot in a general election may, however, in addition to the disbursements and obligations to make disbursements provided for in sub-section one hereof, make further disbursements in connection with any general election, not exceeding in the aggregate the sum of ten thousand dollars.

(2) Nothing contained in this act shall be construed to authorize the state central committee of any political party, to make disbursements in connection with any election, in excess in the aggregate of ten thousand dollars and every disbursement by any such committee in excess of such amount is forbidden.

Sec. 26. No corporation doing business in this state shall pay or contribute, or offer, consent, or agree to pay or contribute, directly or indirectly, any money, property, free service of its officers or employes or thing of value to any political party, organization, committee or individual for any political purpose whatsoever, or to promote or defeat the candidacy of any person for nomination, election or appointment to any political office. If any corporation shall be convicted of violating any of the provisions of this act, it shall be subject to a penalty in the amount of not exceeding ten thousand (10,000) dollars to be collected as other claims or demands for money are collected; and if a domestic corporation, in addition to said penalty, it may be dissolved; and if a foreign or non-resident corporation, in addition to said penalty, its right to do business in this state may be declared forfeited.

Sec. 27. Any officer, employe, agent or attorney or other representative of any corporation, acting for or in behalf of such corporation who shall violate this act, shall be punished upon conviction by a fine of not less than one hundred nor more than five thousand dollars, or by imprisonment in the state prison for a period of not less than one nor more than five years, or by both such fine and imprisonment in the discretion of the court or judge before whom such conviction is had.

Sec. 28. The violation of this act by any officer, of such corporation, shall be prima facie evidence of said violation by such corporation. All fines or forfeitures recovered under the provisions of this act shall when collected be paid into the treasury of the county for the use of the road and bridge fund, and it is hereby made the duty of the county attorney of each county to conduct prosecutions under this act on proper complaint.

Sec. 29. Any person or persons who shall aid, abet, or advise a violation of this act, shall be guilty of a gross misdemeanor and upon conviction thereof shall be punished as provided in this act.

Sec. 30. Violations of this act may be prosecuted in the county where such payment or contribution is made or services rendered or in any county wherein such money has been paid or distributed.

Sec. 31. The officer with whom the expense account of any candidate for public office or committee is required to be filed by this act, shall notify such candidate or committee of the failure to comply with such law, immediately upon the expiration of the time fixed by any law of this state for the filing of the same, and shall notify the county attorney of the county where such candidate resides or in which the headquarters of the committee is located, of the fact of the failure to file such expense account and said county attorney shall thereupon notify such candidate or the secretary of said committee of such delinquency and if the provisions of this act shall not be complied with within ten days after the mailing of such notice, the county attorney shall thereupon prosecute such candidate or the officer of the committee required by law to file such statement.

Sec. 32. If the county attorney of the county shall be notified by any officer or other person of any violation of any of the provisions of this act, it shall be his duty forthwith to diligently inquire into the facts of such violation, and if there is reasonable ground for instituting a prosecution, it shall be the duty of such county attorney to present the said charge, with all the evidence which he can procure, to the grand jury of such county. If any county attorney shall fail or refuse to faithfully perform any duty imposed upon him by this act, he shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and on conviction thereof shall forfeit his office. It shall be the duty of the county attorney, under the penalty of forfeiture of his office, to prosecute any and all persons guilty of any violation of the provisions of this act, the penalty of which is fine or imprisonment, or both, or removal from office. Any citizen may employ an attorney to assist the county attorney to perform his duties under this act, and such attorney shall be recognized by the county attorney and the court as associate counsel in the proceeding; and no prosecution, action or proceeding shall be dismissed without notice to, or against the objection of, such associate counsel until the reasons of the county attorney for such dismissal, together with the objections thereto of said associate counsel, shall have been filed in writing, argued by counsel, and fully considered by the court, with such limitations as to the time of filing such reasons and objections as the court may impose.

Sec. 33. Any twenty-five voters of the state, or of any political division thereof, may contest the right of any person to nomination, position or office for which said voters had the right to vote, on the ground of deliberate, serious and material violation of the provisions of this act or of any other provisions of law relating to nominations and elections. Any defeated candidate for said nomination, position or office may make said contest. Said procedure shall be commenced by petition filed in the district court of the county in which the candidate whose election is contested resides, and the contest shall be carried on according to law.

In case of contests over nominations, the court shall pronounce whether the incumbent or contestant was duly nominated, and the person so declared nominated shall have his name printed on the official ballots.

Sec. 34. When upon the trial of any action or proceedings under this act it shall appear from the evidence that the offense complained of was not committed by the candidate, or with his knowledge or consent, or was committed without his sanction or connivance, and that all reasonable means were taken by such candidate at such election, or were taken by or on behalf of the candidate, or that the offenses complained of were trivial, unimportant or limited in character, and that in all respects his candidacy and election were free from all offensive or illegal acts, or that any act or omission of any candidate complained of arose from accidental miscalculation or from some other reasonable cause of like nature, and in any case did not arise from any want of good faith, and under the circumstances it seems to the court to be unjust that the candidate shall forfeit his nomination, position or office, then the nomination or election of such candidate shall not by reason of such offense complained of to be void, nor shall the candidate be removed from nor deprived of his nomination, position or office.

Sec. 35. Any proceeding under this act contesting any nomination or election must be commenced within ten days after the day of the primary, or thirty days after a general election, unless the ground of action is discovered from the statements filed under this act, in which event the action must be commenced within ten and thirty days after such discovery, respectively. Any proceeding to annul any nomination or election of any person for office mentioned in this act, must be filed in the district court of the county in which the person resides whose right to the nomination, position or office is contested.

Sec. 36. A candidate elected to an office, and whose election thereto has been annulled and set aside for any offense mentioned in this act, shall not, during the period fixed by law as the term of such office, be appointed to fill any vacancy which may occur in such office. A candidate or other person who is removed from or deprived of his office for any offense mentioned in this act, shall not, during the period remaining as the unexpired term of such office, or during the period fixed by law as the next ensuing term of such office, be appointed to fill any vacancy which may occur in such office. Any appointment to an office made in violation of or contrary to the provisions of this section shall be void.

Sec. 37. In event that any provision or paragraph or part of this act shall be questioned in any court and shall be held to be invalid, the remainder of the act shall not be invalidated, but shall remain in full force and effect.

(2) If any person shall, in a criminal action, be adjudicated guilty of any violation of this act, committed while he was a candidate for the office of state senator, member of the house of representatives, United States senator, or representative in congress, or while he was a member of the personal campaign committee of any such candidate, the court, after entering such adjudication, shall forthwith transmit to the presiding officer of the legislative body as a member of which such officer was a candidate when such violation occurred, a certificate setting forth such adjudication of guilty.

Sec. 39. Nothing contained in this act shall prevent any candidate from employing counsel to represent him in any action or proceeding, affecting his rights as a candidate, nor from paying all costs and disbursements necessary incidental thereto. No sum so paid or incurred shall be deemed a part of the campaign expenses of any such candidate.

Sec. 40. The following words and phrases as used in this act shall be construed as follows:

THE LOCAL NEWS.

Call and see us, when you are ready to make your final proof.

Lars Hyland was a business caller of this office to-day.

Walter McAndress commenced his barley harvest to-day. All grain is filling fine as we have ideal weather for it.

Since the lumber companies have removed their log jams the Red Lake River is about its normal heighth, but people are still continuing to ford it which is rather dangerous.

James O'Brien, Abe Bost Fred and Marshall Shedd, Lonard McAndress and Henry Arndt and family attended the circus at Thief River Falls Wednesday.

We would like to take in the County Fair at Theif River Falls, but it comes on Friday, a very busy week day for us as it is publication day.

Marshall Shedd filed on the last vacant piece of swamp land in the town of Highlanding Wednesday. These lands will be fine farming lands as soon as we get the ditches in.

Read the annoucement of teachers examinations published in another column. Teachers who expect to teach school the coming year should attend these examinations.

There was a social dance given at the Ele Sanders bowery last Saturday evening which drew a fair sized crowd and a pleasant time was enjoyed by all who attended.

Read the political announcements in another column, as it is a request for your assistance. It is better for a candidate who is unable to meet all the voters to ask their support in this way than to expect them to hunt him up and vote for him anyway.

The fair at Theif River Falls is to be held almost to early in the season for the farmers to get many farm products ready, but they should do the best they can by sending in the best bundle of grain, or vegetables that they have.

One of the needs of this town is a town hall where the people would have some suitable place to hold public meetings. There is nothing that helps to build up a community so much as for the people to meet once in a while and talk matters over, and there is absolutely no suitable place for them to meet in this township at the present time.

P.C. Wold was over here yesterday looking over land with the Agent of the Minnesota Loan and Trust Co. This company made two what was considered large loans on realestate some four years ago. The farmers thought they had beat the loan Co. proper and abonded the land. To-day the company can sell them farms for their money back, interest and taxes and a handsome profit. The man who is of the opinion that he is beating anyone when he sells them Pennington County land will find out that he is the one that got the worst end of the deal in a very few years.

Major Shunk, of the St. Paul goverment Engineers has been transferred to another locality so he will have nothing further to do with the Red Lake River. But of course Taft has plenty of more gentlemen? As well qualified to represent the lumber companies as the Major was. Ointment put on a boil may relieve the pain for a short time, but you have got to get the sore out before the sore will heal and the people will squeese the core out of that Engineers outfit in November. Old Taft is to late with his talk of reform, as the only cry now is "Fire him out", and that damnable governor that appointed tools of the corporations on the game and fish commission of this state with him.

This is an age of great discoveries. Progress rides on the air. Soon we may see Uncle Sam's mail carriers flying in all directions, transporting mail. People take a wonderful interest in a discovery that benifits them. That's why Dr. King's New Discovery for Coughs Colds and other throat and lung diseases is the most popular medicine in America. "It cured me of a dreadful cough," writes Mrs. J. F. Davis, Stickney Corner, Me., "after doctor's treatment and all other remedies had failed." For coughs, cold or any brochial affection its unequaled. Price 50c and $1.00. Trial bottle free at All Druggists.

PENNINGTON COUNTY FAIR.

The annual Pennington County fair will be held at Thief River Falls on August 1st 2, 3. The fair promises to be better than ever this year and the farmers should endeavor to get out a good display of farm products. The season has been rather dry, but let us show outsiders that Pennington County have as good, or better than most of the other counties.

In Peril

"Get out!" said Brill emphatically, but in a restrained voice.

He had no wish to call attention to the fact that he was abnormally afraid of dogs. And this was such a little dog! But Brill's fear was not commensurate with the size of the beast. It was the fact that it was a dog that caused his flesh to creep and his spinal column to tingle. Especially did he hate a dog that tagged at his heels, as this one was doing.

He had started out for a walk in the early evening while it was still light and was enjoying his cigar immensely until he discovered his attendant. It made the situation worse that the animal did not growl or snap or bark or yelp, but just trotted along with his nose down in a business-like manner that was both mysterious and terrifying in its latent possibilities.

"Get out!" murmured Brill a second time and gave a kick toward the rear. But the animal did not even halt.

It was one of those fuzzy white dogs so designed architecturally that the unsophisticated observer could never be sure which end was head. Brill had the advantage of knowing that the dog's head was next Brill's calves, since nothing short of a circus dog could have run along backward so easily. It was the fact that he was quite sure which end was the dog's head that especially disturbed him.

Brill walked faster and so did the dog. Once it made a detour to the edge of the sidewalk, where it sniffed the air. Brill started to heave a sigh of relief, but the fuzzy dog rushed back to his heels apologetically, as though to assure him that it had no thought of deserting its post. Brill's blood curdled and he turned around.

"Shoo!" he cried, waving his hands violently. "Get out! Go away! I don't want you!" Then he resumed his walk.

Having gone six paces, he looked carefully over one shoulder and saw that the dog was still coming. It was then that he almost broke into a run, for he had decided that this strangely silent animal must indeed be mad and was merely prolonging his agony before it finally bit him.

He resolved to appeal to the first policeman he saw. It was a small dog to be shot by a big policeman, but if people persisted in allowing their ferocious animals to infest the streets and there terrify pedestrians they must abide by the consequences.

It was the beast's steady, silent persistence which convinced Brill that he was in a highly perilous situation. The perspiration began to bead his face and he breathed hard. There was no policeman in sight. He passed a woman and a little girl, but even in his agitation he could not bring himself to appeal to a woman for protection. He supposed that almost any man would have looked at the dog and grinned if he did not happen to have the same dislike for dogs which afflicted Brill. He knew now precisely how a woman felt in the presence of a mouse and he resolved that never again would he jeer at a woman in such a situation.

Brill had gone two blocks with the terror at his heels and he felt that he had gone a mile. Unable to stand it any longer, he whirled about.

"You miserable little beast!" he cried. "I'd like to choke you! Get out!"

He did not notice the pretty young woman who crossed over from the opposite sidewalk when he began threatening the dog. With a little rush she grabbed up the bundle of fluff and then glared at Brill.

"What do you mean," she demanded, "by scolding my dog?"

"Is it yours?" Brill asked, sternly. "Well, all I've got to say is that people who let dangerous animals parade the streets ready to bite any one that passes, have no regard for the law or—"

Brill was interrupted by a scornful laugh from the girl. "Fifi bite!" she murmured. "How could he?"

She parted the fluff and brought the dog's ridiculous nose to view. Over that nose a tiny muzzle was securely fastened.

"Oh," said Brill foolishly. "I beg your pardon," he added, as he mopped his forehead. Then he hurried on.—Chicago Daily News.

Germany Officers Angry.

An angry controversy is raging in German military circles about a remarkable entertainment given a few days ago at the "Landwehr officers" casino in the Hardenberg strasse. The kaiser usually attends this entertainment, but this year, owing to the death of the Grand Duke of Luxemburg, he sent his son, Prince Eitel Friedrich.

The chief feature was a "champagne dance." An officer in uniform led in a "lady" and danced with her in a very lively ultra-modern style. The "lady" then disrobed on the stage and turned out to be one of the officers.

Prince Eitel Friedrich applauded this entertainment, but some senior officers were highly indignant and complained that the kaiser's uniform was degraded. They were all the angrier because several privates were present as ticket takers, doorkeepers, etc., and these for the first time in their lives were seen laughing at the antics of their superiors.

Didn't Wait the Attack.

At Boulogne, during a royal reception some years ago a number of English ladies in their anxiety to see everything pressed with such force against the soldiers who were keeping the line that the soldiers were forced to give way and generally were, as policemen say, "hindered in the execution of their duty." The officer in command, observing the state of affairs, called out: "One roll of the drum! If they don't stand back kiss them all!" After the first sound of the drum the ladies took to flight.

"If they had been French," said a Parisian journal, "they would have remained to a woman."

Gilbert's Witty Comment.

Sir W. S. Gilbert's wit and humor were always ready. He was a fine raconteur and a good after dinner speaker. Rutland Barrington, the old Savoyard, said that "staying in Gilbert's house was like living in a literary fireworks factory."

Barrington played the Captain in "Pinafore." At rehearsal one day Gilbert, who was an autocratic and magnificent stage manager, told him to cross the stage, which represented the deck of H. M. S. Pinafore, and sit on a skylight "in a pensive attitude." Barrington obeyed orders, but unfortunately the skylight had only been rigged up temporarily, and the portly Barrington crashed through it.

"That's an expensive attitude," said Gilbert in a flash.

He Had Reformed.

A young man who was an enthusiastic lover of nature went to the seaside for a holiday and, approaching a typical fisherman, said:

"Ah, my friend, how well you must know the face of nature and know it in its many moods! Have you ever seen the sun sinking in such a glare of glory that it swallows up the horizon with fire? Have you not seen the mist gliding down the shrinking hillside like a specter?"

And, very excited and throwing out his arms, he continued:

"Have you never seen, my man, the moon struggling to shake off the ragged, rugged storm cloud?"

The fisherman replied. "No, sir; I have not since I signed the pledge."—Pearson's Weekly.

SYNOPSIS.

Lieut. Harry Mallory is ordered to the Philippines. He and Marjorie Newton decide to elope, but wreck of taxicab prevents their seeing minister on the way to the train. Transcontinental train is taking on passengers. Porter has a lively time with an Englishman and Ira Lathrop, a Yankee business man. The elopers have an exciting time getting to the train. "Little Jimmie" Wellington, bound for Reno to get a divorce, boards train in maudlin condition. Later Mrs. Jimmie appears. She is also bound for Reno with same object. Likewise Mrs. Sammy Whitcomb. Latter blames Mrs. Jimmie for her marital troubles. Classmates of Mallory decorate bridal berth.

CHAPTER VI—(Continued).

Then Ashton intervened like a dog in the manger and dragged her off to her seat, leaving the young man to exclaim:

"Some tamarind, that!"

Another young man behind him growled: "Cut out the tamarinds and get to business. Mallory will be here any minute."

"I hate to think what he'll do to us when he sees what we've done to him."

"Oh, he won't dare to fight in the presence of his little bridey-widey. Do you see the porter in there?"

"Yes, suppose he objects."

"Well, we have the tickets. We'll claim it's our section till Mallory and Mrs. Mallory come."

They moved on into the car, where the porter confronted them. When he saw that they were loaded with bundles of all shapes and sizes, he waved them away with scorn:

"The emigrant sleepa runs only Toosdays and Thuzzdays."

From behind the first mass of packages came a brisk military answer:

"You black hound! About face—forward march! Section number one."

The porter retreated down the aisle, apologizing glibly. "'Scuse me for questioning' you, but you-all's baggage looked kind o' eccentric at first."

The two young men dumped their parcels on the seats and began to unwrap them hastily.

"If Mallory catches us, he'll kill us," said Lieutenant Shaw. Lieutenant Hudson only laughed and drew out a long streamer of white satin ribbon. Its glimmer, and the glimmering eyes of the young man excited Mrs. Whitcomb so much that after a little hesitance she moved forward, followed by the jealous Ashton.

"Oh, what's up?" she ventured. "It looks like something bridal."

"Talk about womanly intuition!" said Lieutenant Hudson, with an ingratiating salaam.

And then they explained to her that their classmate at West Point, being ordered suddenly to the Philippines, had arranged to elope with his beloved Marjorie Newton; had asked them to get the tickets and check the baggage while he stopped at a minister's to "get spliced and hike for Manila by this train."

Having recounted this plan in the full belief that it was even at that moment being carried out successfully, Lieutenant Hudson, with a ghoulish smile, explained:

"Being old friends of the bride and groom, we want to fix their section up in style and make them truly comfortable."

"Delicious!" gushed Mrs. Whitcomb. "But you ought to have some rice and old shoes."

"Here's the rice," said Hudson.

"Here's the old shoes," said Shaw.

"Lovely!" cried Mrs. Whitcomb, but then she grew soberer. "I should think, though, that they—the young couple—would have preferred a stateroom."

"Of course," said Hudson, almost blushing, "but it was taken. This was the best we could do for them."

"That's why we want to make it nice and bride-like," said Shaw. "Perhaps you could help us—a woman's touch—"

"Oh, I'd love to," she glowed, hastening into the section among the young men and the bundles. The unusual stir attracted the porter's suspicions. He came forward with a look of authority:

"'Scuse me, but wha—what's all this?"

"Vanish—get out," said Hudson, poking a coin at him. As he turned to obey, Mrs. Whitcomb checked him with: "Oh, Porter, could you get us a hammer and some nails?"

The porter almost blanched: "Good Lawd, Miss, you ain't allowin' to drive nails in that woodwork, is you?" That woodwork was to him what the altar is to the priest.

But Hudson, resorting to heroic measures, hypnotized him with a two-dollar bill: "Here, take this and see nothing, hear nothing, say nothing." The porter caressed it and chuckled: "I'm blind, deaf and speechless." He turned away, only to come back at once with a timid "'Scuse me!"

"You here yet?" growled Hudson.

Anxiously the porter pleaded: "I just want to ast one question. Is you all fixin' up for a bridal couple?"

"Foolish question, number eight million, forty-three," said Shaw. "Answer, no, we are."

The porter's face glistened like fresh stove polish as he gloated over the prospect. "I tell you, it'll be mahty refreshin' to have a bridal couple on bode! This dog-on Reno train don't carry nothin' much but divorcees. I'm just nachally hongry for a bridal couple."

"Brile coup-hic-le?" came a voice, like an echo that had somehow become intoxicated in transit. It was Little Jimmie Wellington looking for more sympathy. "Whass zis about brile couple?"

"Why, here's Little Buttercup!" sang out young Hudson, looking at him in amazed amusement.

"Did I un'stan' somebody say you're preparing for brile coupl'?"

Lieutenant Shaw grinned. "I don't know what you understood, but that's what we're doing."

Immediately Wellington's great face began to churn and work like a big eddy in a river. Suddenly he was weeping. "Excuse these tears, zhentlemen, but I once—I was once a b-b-bride myself."

"He looks like a whole wedding party," was Ashton's only comment on the copious grief. It was poor Wellington's fate to hunt as vainly for sympathy as Diogenes for honesty. The decorators either ignored him or shunted him aside. They were interested in a strange contrivance of ribbons and a box that Shaw produced.

"That," Hudson explained, "is a little rice trap. We hang that up there and when the bridal couple sit down—biff! a shower of rice all over them. It's bad, eh?"

Everybody agreed that it was a happy thought, and even Jimmie Wellington, like a great baby, bounding from tears to laughter on the instant, was chortling: "A rishe trap? That's abslootly splendid—greates' invensh' modern times. I must stick around and see her when she flops." And then he lurched forward like a too-obliging elephant. "Let me help you."

Mrs. Whitcomb, who had now mounted a step ladder and poised herself as gracefully as possible, shrieked with alarm, as she saw Wellington's hulk rolling toward her frail support.

If Hudson and Shaw had not been football veterans at West Point and had not known just what to do when the center rush comes bucking the line, they could never have blocked that flying wedge. But they checked him and impelled him backward through his own curtains into his own berth.

Finding himself on his back, he decided to remain there. And there he remained, oblivious of the carnival preparations going on just outside his canopy.

CHAPTER VII.

The Masked Minister.

Being an angel must have this great advantage at least, that one may sit in the grandstand overlooking the earth and enjoy the ludicrous blunder of that great blind man's buff we call life.

This night, if any angels were watching Chicago, the Mallory mix-up must have given them a good laugh, or a good cry—according to their natures.

Mrs. Walter Temple.

Here were Mallory and Marjorie, still merely engaged, bitterly regretting their inability to get married and to continue their journey together. There in the car were the giggling conspirators preparing a bridal mockery for their sweet confusion.

Then the angels might have nudged one another and said:

"Oh, it's all right now. There goes the minister hurrying to their very car. Mallory has the license in his pocket, and here comes the parson. Hooray!"

And then the angelic cheer must have died out as the one great hurrah of a crowded ball-ground is quenched in air when the home team's vitally needed home run swerves outside the line and drops useless as a stupid foul ball.

In a shabby old hack were two of the happiest runaways that ever sought a train. They were not miserable like the young couple in the taxicab. They were white-haired both. They had been married for thirty years. Yet this was their real honeymoon, their real elopement.

The little woman in the timid gray bonnet clapped her hands and tittered like a schoolgirl.

"Oh, Walter, I can't believe we're really going to leave Ypsilanti for a while. Oh, but you've earned it after thirty years of being a preacher."

"Hush. Don't let me hear you say the awful word," said the little old man in the little black hat and the close-fitting black bib. "I'm so tired of it, Sally, I don't want anybody on the train to know it."

"They can't help guessing it, with your collar buttoned behind."

And then the amazing minister actually dared to say, "Here's where I change it around." What's more, he actually did it. Actually took off his collar and buttoned it to the front. The old carriage seemed almost to rock with the earthquake of the deed.

"Why, Walter Temple!" his wife exclaimed. "What would they say in Ypsilanti?"

"They'll never know," he answered, defiantly.

"But your bib?" she said.

"I've thought of that, too," he cried, as he whipped it off and stuffed it into a handbag. "Look, what I've bought." And he dangled before her startled eyes a long affair which the sudden light from a passing lamp-post revealed to be nothing less than a flaring red tie.

The old lady touched it to make sure she was not dreaming it. Then, omitting further parley with fate, she snatched it away, put it round his neck, and, since her arms were embracing him, kissed him twice before she knotted the ribbon into a flaming bow. She sat back and regarded the vision a moment, then flung her arms round him and hugged him till he gasped:

"Watch out—watch out. Don't crush my cigars."

"Cigars! Cigars!" she echoed, in a daze.

And then the astounding husband produced them in proof.

"Genuine Lillian Russells—five cents straight."

"But I never saw you smoke."

"Haven't taken a puff since I was a young fellow," he grinned, wagging his head. "But now it's my vacation, and I'm going to smoke up."

She squeezed his hand with an earlier ardor: "Now you're the old Walter Temple I used to know."

"Sally," he said, "I've been traveling through life on a half-fare ticket. Now I'm going to have my little fling. And you brace up, too, and be the old mischievous Sally I used to know. Aren't you glad to be away from those sewing circles and gossip-bees, and —"

"Ugh! Don't ever mention them," she shuddered. Then she, too, felt a tinge of recurring springtide. "If you start to smoking, I think I'll take up flirting once more."

He pinched her cheek and laughed "As the saying is, go as far as you desire and I'll leave the coast clear."

He kept his promise, too, for they were no sooner on the train and snugly bestowed in section five, than he was up and off.

"Where are you going?" she asked.

"To the smoking-room," he swaggered, brandishing a dangerous looking cigar.

"Oh, Walter," she snickered, "I feel like a young runaway."

"You look like one. Be careful not to let anybody know that you're a"—he lowered his voice—"an old preacher's wife."

"I'm as ashamed of it as you are," she whispered. Then he threw her a kiss and a wink. She threw him a kiss and winked too. And he went along the aisle eyeing his cigar gloatingly. As he entered the smoking-room, lighted the weed and blew out a great puff with a sigh of rapture, who could have taken him, with his feet cocked up, and his red tie rakishly askew, for a minister?

And Sally herself was busy disguising herself, loosening up her hair coquettishly, smiling the primness out of the set corners of her mouth and even—let the truth be told at all costs—even passing a pink-powdered puff over her pale cheeks with guilty surreption.

Thus arrayed she was soon joining the conspirators bedecking the bower for the expected bride and groom. She was the youngest and most mischievous of the lot. She felt herself a bride again, and vowed to protect this timid little wife to come from too much hilarity at the hands of the conspirators.

Honor Utterer of Epigrams.

The Japanese are great admirers of epigrams and apt phrases. Their love of such things is carried so far that when a guest says something unusually brilliant the host or hostess will beg him to write down his remark in large ornamental script. The sentence is then mounted and hung on the wall as a permanent addition to its ornaments, much as we might hang up a text or motto. Naturally the author of a bon mot treated in this way feels himself highly honored to be thus placed on record. But the sentences are selected more for their wisdom than their humor; so that the funny man is not much in evidence.

Was 102 and Didn't Know It.

POULTRY

FEEDS FOR EGG PRODUCTION

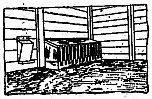
Farmer Should Be Able to Supplement Natural Resources of the Farm to Increase Revenue.

(By J. S. JEFFERY.)

The production of eggs for market is generally considered the most profitable branch of poultry keeping.

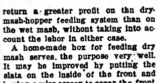
Under proper conditions there is no reason why eggs should not be produced at a price that will allow a good margin of profit. This should be especially true of eggs produced on farms where the fowls may find a large part of their sustenance at no cost to the farmer, utilizing what would otherwise be waste products.

With a knowledge of what is necessary for the best results in egg production, the farmer should be able to supplement the natural resources of the farm in such a way that revenue from the hens would be largely increased by a small extra outlay for food.



Home-Made Box for Feeding Dry Mash

It has been demonstrated that fowls do better where they have part of their ration of grains, either whole or cracked, and part of it of ground products or what is commonly called a mash. Until within the last few years, it has been the custom to feed this mash wet. This necessitated the mixing of the mash fresh for each feeding and required a great deal of extra work in mixing and feeding. On this account the farmer has never taken to the feeding of mash. With the introduction of the feeding of this part of the ration dry, from hoppers or feed boxes, the objection to it has been largely done away with, and it can now be fed with less labor than can grain. Enough mash can be mixed and put in the feed boxes to last for a week or ten days with no more work than was necessary for the feeding of the day's ration under the old method. Not only is there this great saving in labor, but it has been shown that hens return a greater profit on the dry-mash-hopper feeding system than on the wet mash, without taking into account the labor in either case.



Galvanized Iron Box for Dry Mash.

A home-made box for feeding dry mash serves the purpose very well. It may be improved by putting the slats on the inside of the front and having a wire screen to cover the front at night to keep out rats.

A good style of galvanized feed box is covered by a grating of expanded metal. The hens get their food through this grating and are thus prevented from pulling a part of the mash out of the hopper in their search for the ingredients they like best. By hooking the lower end of the grating up at night, the hopper is made rat-proof.

Boil Drinking Vessels.

If many chicks are raised it is a good plan to keep a large kettle near the poultry house in which the drinking vessels can be boiled at least once a week. A handful of common soda thrown in the water will help.

Treating Chicken-Pox.

Chicken-pox can be successfully treated by anointing the head and wattles with carbolated vaseline, after having first bathed well with hot water. A one-grain quinine pill should also be given each night for a week.

Frightened Hen.

The hen that flees when you enter the yard or run has you "spotted" as a disturbing element. Change your attitude and you will at once change hers for the better.

Improving the Flock.

The welfare of the flock is in no way improved by irregular and indifferent breeding. Regularity is to the liking of the business hen as well as of the business man.

Failures are Common.

The failures in poultry culture are no more common than in other commercial activities, and are usually traceable to a want of proper knowledge of its requirements.

The Moon's Offspring.

Looking out of the window one evening, little Marie saw the bright, full moon in the eastern sky, and, apparently, only a few inches from it, the beautiful Jupiter, shining almost as brightly as the moon itself. Marie gazed intently at the spectacle for a moment, and then turning to her mother exclaimed:

"Oh, mother, look! The moon has laid an egg!"

No Social Tact.

At a club dance an enthusiastic member approached a rather dull member and said to him:

"Say, for heaven's sake go over and talk to Miss Fryte. She is sitting all by herself."

"But—but what shall I say to her?"

"Tell her how pretty she is."

"But she ain't pretty."

"Well, then, tell her how ugly the other girls are. Ain't you got no social tact?"

Mixture of Caution and Economy.

At the Union depot a few evenings ago a mother who had gone to see her daughter, a miss of about 18 years, safely started on a journey, was heard to give the young lady the following words of advice just before the train started: "Now, goodby, my dear Take good care of yourself and remember not to be too free with strangers on the train. But if a nice looking man should speak to you be polite to him—he may buy your supper for you."—Kansas City Star.

Simple Explanation.

To illustrate a point that he was making—that his was the race with a future and not a race with a past—Booker T. Washington told this little story the other day.

He was standing by his door one morning when old Aunt Caroline went by.

"Good morning, Aunt Caroline," he said. "Where are you going this morning?"

"Lawzee, Mista' Wash'ton," she replied. "I'se done been whar I'se gwine."—Kansas City Star.

Shock for a Brother.

"John," said an eminent physician, wearily, entering his home after a hard day's work, "John, if anyone calls excuse me."

"Yes, suh," agreed John, the old family darkey.

"Just say," explained the doctor, "that the masseur is with me."

A little later the doctor's brother called—called and received the shock of his life.

"I want to see the doctor at once," said he.

"Yuh can't do it, suh," solemnly announced the old darkey, turning up his eyes till the whites alone showed. "Yuh can't do it, suh. The doctor, suh, am wid de Messiah."—New York Evening Sun.

They Are Overworked Now.

Four-year-old Dick had made an important discovery that his hair would pull out if enough force was exerted, and was absorbed in proving the fascinating find on his forelock. His sister—aged seven—noted the proceedings with round-eyed horror.

"Why?" demanded Dickie, with the cynicism of childhood.

"Because the Bible says that all your hairs are numbered—and if you pull any out you'll make a lot of extra bookkeeping for the angels."

Her Ruling Passion.

The woman who had chased dust and dirt all her life finally reached St. Peter.

"Come in, you poor, tired woman," he said, and held the gate ajar.

But the woman hesitated.

"Tell me first," she said, "how often you clean house?"

The saint smiled.

"You can't shake off the ruling passion, can you?" he said. "Oh, well, step inside and they'll give you a broom and dustpan instead of a harp."—Cleveland Plain Dealer.

Something Bound to Happen.

A young man who had been born and reared in the back woods went to Chicago and made a lot of money. Then he returned to his native village and asked his father to take a trip to the Windy City. The old man, however, was not enthusiastic over the proposition. He had read of fires, motor car accidents and other catastrophes in big cities. Finally, after much argument and persuasion on the part of his son the father reluctantly consented to undertake the journey. At a little country station he was panic stricken and tried to get permission to go back home. Once on the train his nerve began to revive and all went well until the train dashed into a tunnel as black as night. When this happened the old man grabbed his umbrella, hit his son a whack on the head and cried out:

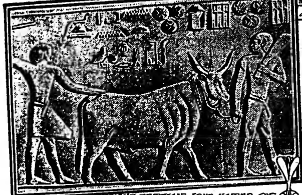
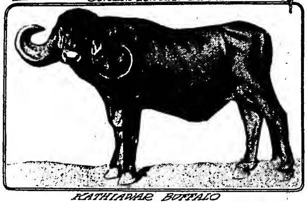
The STORY of the OX

A PAIR OF YOUNG ANOAS



ANCIENT EGYPTIAN LONG-HAIRED OX

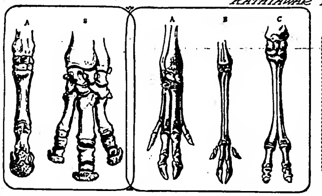


KATHIAWAR BUFFALO

SOME of the most fascinating chapters in the book of science deal with the story of the way the various animals which inhabit the earth, each after its own kind, have come about through long ages of tentative development during a thousand generations. When the fossil remains of other beasts than those we know were first studied at the beginning of the last century, there were many searchings of heart among the pious of that day, and instead of looking upon them as the most wonderful entries in nature's ledger, some good people regarded them as the malicious inventions of the devil, intended to lead astray the over-curious.

In his book, "The Ox and Its Kindred" (Methuen), Mr. Lydekker tells us the story of our domestic cattle as it is revealed by the examination of the various species, living wild and in captivity, and by the fossil remains of their progenitors. Although there are a very large number of species belonging to the suborder Artiodactyla (the Greek word artios, meaning equal, and dactulos, toe), which comprises the ox and the other ruminants (i. e., animals that have the power of regurgitating and remasticating their food), their history is not so well displayed by their fossil remains as that of the Perissodactyla, or odd-toed, hoofed animals, which have only the horse and some half-dozen other representatives.

Both families consist, of course, of hoofed animals; but the ox group differs widely from the horse and its relations through the special development of the stomach required by ruminants, instead of the simple and almost imperceptible divisions into cardiac and pyloric portions common to man and most other animals. The stomach of the ox has five chambers, two of which constitute the rumen, or paunch; in this the grass is first stored after it is cut by the incisors acting against the pad which takes their place in the upper jaw. When the animal has taken in as much food as it requires it seeks a place of safety if wild, or settles down in the field if domesticated, and proceeds to regurgitate, that is to say, bring back the food it has taken in, and chew it up in the powerful mill formed by its cheek or molar teeth. When the food has been re-swallowed it is taken into the reticulum, or honeycomb chamber, of the stomach, where it is acted upon by the digestive juices, and is then passed on through the psalterium, or manyplies, the abomasum and pyloric opening into the small intestine.



When a ruminant is engaged in chewing the cud, after a mouthful of food has been masticated and swallowed, the animal, as may be seen if a herd of recumbent cows are watched shortly after their meal, will remain perfectly still for a few seconds, after which a kind of convulsive movement will be observed in the throat, followed by the sudden upward movement of a "bolus" through the gullet into the mouth to be masticated.

The most striking feature in the structure of members of the ox family is the development of the foot. Both the horse and the ox tribe have developed towards the one end of great speed over firm ground, and both have become specialized almost as completely as possible; but they have adapted themselves in different ways. In the case of the horse the middle toe has been developed and the others suppressed. The ox and its tribe, on the other hand, have developed the two central toes, hence the name of their sub-order, Artiodactyla.

This specialization has entailed an enormous extension of the two bones corresponding to the middle bones of the hand (metacarpals) and of the foot (metatarsals); these have also become more or less completely fused in the different members of the family, consequently the joint corresponding to the human wrist has become the knee in oxen. Our illustrations showing the bones of the fore foot of various members of these two sub-orders, Artiodactyla and Perissodactyla (or odd-toed) will make this point clearer than much discussion. It will be seen that the hoofed (ungulate) animals really walk on the tip of what corresponds to the finger nails in man and the claws in carnivora, and not on their feet at all, if feet are looked at from the point of view of creatures like ourselves who walk in plantigrade fashion.

One of the most fascinating studies in connection with natural history is the way different members of the same family will modify and adapt themselves to the varying local conditions to be met with. A glance at our illustrations will show the wide extent of these variations. At first sight the weird auroch, or wild ox of Poland, recorded by Count von Herberstein in 1549, bears a greater resemblance to the phantom of an evil dream than anything we know in our fields and parks to-day. And, no doubt, it owes [illegible] quaintness to the artist. Even more strange are the Kathiawar buffaloes of northwestern India, with their pathetic expression caused by their curling ram-like horns; an ungainly, ill-made beast but powerful. It stands fully five feet high at the shoulder. At the other end of the scale comes the anoa, or pigmy buffalo, of the island of Celebes; it is the smallest of all the wild cattle, and is about the same size as the dwarf giant domesticated humped cattle of India. It stands only three feet three inches at the shoulder, though it is rather higher at the loins. "Despite its slender build, as compared with larger cattle, its small, neat ears and upwardly-directed horns, which incline upwards and outwards in the plane of the face, without any distinct curvature, the anoa is essentially a buffalo whose affinities are with the Indian species," says Mr. Lydekker.

Although the remains of the bovidae are slight, comparatively speaking, we have evidence that they formed the quarry of the men of the Stone Age, because at Cambridge the skeleton of an aurochs, or wild ox, is preserved which was killed by a stone weapon, and many other skeletons have been found which show that the animal was slain in the chase. There is one prehistoric drawing of an extinct buffalo which was found in North Africa; but as a rule the artists of the prehistoric ages showed very little enthusiasm for the ox as a subject to sketch, in spite of their obviously keen interest in him as an addition to the larder; their pictures are chiefly concerned with horses, men and dogs. Somewhat after the fashion of their modern brethren, save, perhaps, Mr. Arneshy Brown and some few others who achieve their greatest triumphs with these subjects. Though Mr. Arneshy Brown, be it noted, seems to prefer the latter portions of his models for portraiture.

From the point of view of the geologist the ox tribe are a modern group, and only date back to the early part of the Pliocene, or upper division of the Tertiary epoch. They are related to the antelopes, and may own cousinship with the gnus of Africa; but their direct ancestors are still unknown. The earliest representatives of the group are very similar to buffaloes, which constitute, in some respects, the most primitive of the living forms, and are those whose horns come nearest in shape to those of gnus.

The group is of old-world origin, and the bisons were the only section which reached America. They traveled by way of Behring Strait, and at one time reached as far south as Texas and California, but never penetrated into South America. Seven species of American bison have been identified.

The extinct wild cattle of Europe and Western Asia are called aurochs (Bos teurns primigeolus); they were represented in Algeria and Tunis by a local race (B. t. meuritanicus). A nearly-allied species is the great extinct ox (B. namadicus) of the superficial, or Pleistocene, gravels of the valley of the Norbado in Central India.

In Northern India, in the well-known Tertiary deposits of the Siwaliks Hills and other low ranges at the foot of the Himalaye, remains of several kinds of cattle are met with, and as these Siwalik strata are at least early Pliocene, their fossil cattle are the oldest known members of the group. The largest and most remarkable of these Siwalik forms of typical oxen is the one for which Mr. Lydekker proposed the name B. acutifrons. From the aurochs and its relatives this Siwalik ox is distinguished by the sharp longitudinal ridge down the middle of the forehead. More or less perfect skulls of a very remarkable type of ox have been obtained from the alluvial upper Pliocene deposits of the Val d'Arno in Tuscany, and corresponding formations in Southern France. This extinct Etruscan ox (B. elatus or B. etruscus) represents a distinct subgenus known as Leptobos, and is characterized by the absence of horns in the cows, and by those of the bulls arising on each side of the skull from a point nearly midway between the occiput and the socket of the eye; the skull itself is also remarkable for its shortness.

Another interesting progenitor of the ox is the great extinct bison (B. priscus) of the caverns and gravels of England and the superficial formations of Europe. This animal differed from the living species in the enormous size of its horns.

DREAD CHILDREN OF WAR

SLAVERY, DECEIT, CRUELTY, FAMINE, ARSON, PILLAGE AND PESTILENCE

War has had many children since the world began, the New York Mail remarks. Some of them are dead now, but others are alive. War's first born was slavery. The savage who conquered his neighbor in the forest killed him as a matter of course, but he made captives of his family and his dependents, and these captives were slaves. By and by it became so profitable to hold slaves that conquered men were not killed, but spared for a fate worse than death. And in the measure that war drove and spread and became vaster and more dreadful, slavery spread and flourished, too. It was but yesterday that we ended it in America; and it is not yet gone from the earth. War's next child was pestilence. She was hideous! But not so hideous as slavery. She follows war like a shadow. With the wings of the vulture, she hovers over the camp. Born on the battle field, she flies over all the world for that point of vantage, and her victims vastly outnumber those of war itself. She is so closely associated with her blood-stained parent that it is probable that if war were no more on the earth there would be no more pestilence as long as the world endures. Then famine. This sister came later than pestilence, and her ravages have been more dreadful. In this age and quarter of the world we do not have famine in the same guise as that in which she visited the middle ages and still visits Asia. Our people do not die [illegible] upon the streets, as in [illegible]

She visits us in unemployment and adversity. She drags out her curse over the years. The crust may not be wanting; but the horrible waste and charge of the armaments, upon the western world, withhold from the mouths of countless thousands the nourishing food to which their hard toil entitles them. Famine, as the child of war, means for us the untold billions that are squandered on battleships which in a few years are junk, to the robbery of legitimate industry. Hatred between peoples, fratricidal enmity, is another child of war. This ugly sister of pestilence and famine we have had with us many years in America. Even to this day, after half a century, she waves her bloody shirt in the halls of congress. Then there is arrogance, which is war's legitimate offspring; and deceit, for all is fair in war, and the student in the military academy is taught first of all to fool the enemy with all manner of lies, the baser the better. And arson and pillage—are they not the children of war that survive to this day? Last of all, the ultimate breeding power of war has been well expressed by one who said: "War is the father of more wars." Never was there a war that did not leave its offspring in hatreds that had somehow to be worked out. The world is full today of wars that are merely awaiting their declaration. The state of Europe is more like war than it is like peace. Every dreadnought [illegible] of the mighty armaments [illegible]

STATES AWAKING TO DANGER

Additional Hospital Beds for the Treatment of Tuberculosis Are Being Established.

Nearly 4,000 additional hospital beds for consumptives in 29 states were provided during the year ending June 1, according to a statement issued by the National Association for the Study and prevention of Tuberculosis. This makes a total of over 30,000 beds, but only about one for every ten indigent tuberculosis patients in this country.

In the last five years, the hospital provision for consumptives has increased from 14,428 in 1907, to over 30,000 in 1912, or over 100 per cent. New York state leads in the number of beds, having 8,350 on June 1; Massachusetts comes next with 2,800; and Pennsylvania, a close third, with 2,700. Alabama showed the greatest percentage of increase in the last year by adding 57 new beds to its 42 a year ago. Georgia comes next with 109 beds added to 240 a year ago. New York has the greatest numerical increase, having provided over 1,800 additional beds in the year.

Making Cheese in Olden Days.

Cheese was made by the old-time farmers in the summer on the co-operative plan by which four cattle owners owning say 14 milch cows, received all the milk night and morning, according to the daily yield of their little herd. Thus given two families having five cows each, one with three and one with one, supposing that the average yield per cow was the same, in two weeks, two owners would make five cheeses each; one would press three, and one only one cheese, but this one would be as good and as large as any of the rest.—"Nobility of the Trades—The Farmer," Charles Winslow Hall, in National Magazine.

Good Bait.

Aunt Sarah, cook in a Richmond family, took home a dish of macaroni from her mistress' table for the edification of her own family. When her children had been assured that it was good they proceeded to eat with great gusto. The next morning Aunt Sarah discovered two of her offspring in the yard turning over stones and soil and scratching vigorously in the earth.

"Heah, yo' chilun!" Called out Aunt Sarah, "what ye' all doin'?"

"We's a-huntin'," was the reply, "fo' some mo' of dem macaroni worms."

RASH ALMOST COVERED FACE

Warrenville, O.—"I have felt the effects of blood poisoning for eighteen years. I was never without some eruptions on my body. The terrible itching caused me much suffering and discomfort, while the rubbing and scratching made it worse. Last spring I had a terrible breaking out of blistery sores on my arms and limbs. My face and arms were almost covered with rash. I could not sleep and lost nineteen pounds in five weeks. My face was terribly red and sore, and felt as if my skin was on fire. At last I tried a sample of Cuticura Soap and Cuticura Ointment and I found them so cool, soothing and healing, that I got some Cuticura Soap, Cuticura Ointment, and Resolvent. I bathed with hot water and Cuticura Soap, then I applied the Cuticura Ointment every night for two months, and I am cured of all skin eruptions." (Signed) Mrs. Kathryn Krafft, Nov. 28, 1911.

A WONDERFUL DISCOVERY.

In this age of research and experiment, all nature is ransacked by the scientific for the comfort and happiness of man. Science has indeed made giant strides in the past century, and among the—by no means least important—discoveries in medicine is that of Therapion, which has been used with great success in French Hospitals and that it is worthy the attention of those who suffer from kidney, bladder, nervous diseases, chronic weaknesses, ulcers, skin eruptions, piles, &c., there is no doubt. In fact it seems evident from the big stir created amongst specialists, that THERAPION is destined to cast into oblivion all those questionable remedies that were formerly the sole reliance of medical men. It is of course impossible to tell sufferers all we should like to tell them in this short article, but those who would like to know more about this remedy that has effected so many—we might almost say miraculous cures, should send addressed envelope for FREE book to Dr. Le Clerc Med. Co., Haverstock Road, Hampstead, London, Eng. and decide for themselves whether the New French Remedy "THERAPION" No. 1, No. 2 or No. 3 is what they require and have been seeking in vain during a life of misery, suffering, ill health and unhappiness. A FAIR WOMAN AND A WILD PLOT

REAL STORIES FROM THE LIFE OF A MASTER ADVENTURER

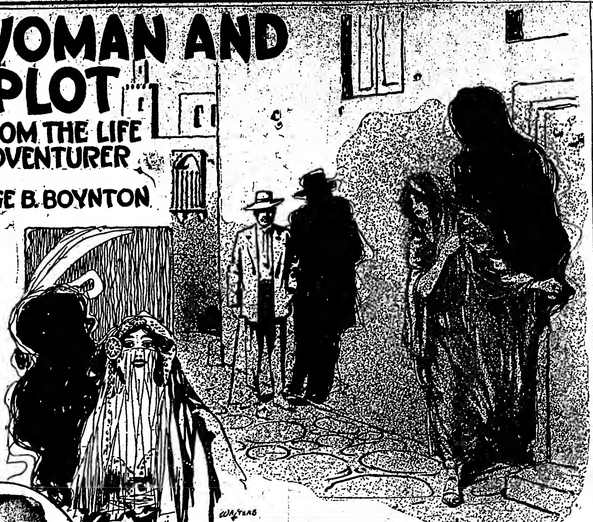
COPYRIGHT BY THE RIDGWAY COMPANY

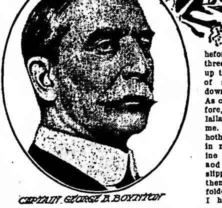


(Editor's Note—Capt. George B. Boynton died a few months ago in Brooklyn. He served, all told, under eighteen flags and his life has furnished much material for fiction. This is a story of some of his adventures told by himself for the first time.)

NEAR the close of 1889 I was seized with a freak of fancy to visit Cairo, the ancient capital of the kings of Egypt—those glorious old marauding monarchs who made despotism a fine art, and graft a religion.

Under my British name of George MacFarlana I stopped at Shepheards' Hotel, then the home of all pilgrims, and gave myself up to the enjoyment of new scenes. It was at the height of the tourist season, following the Christmas holidays, and there was an abundance of company, made of cultured Europeans and a few Americans of gentle birth, for that was before Cairo was overrun with the over-rich. The time was delightfully whiled away for a month before anything happened to indicate the reason for my being there, but within less than half of that time I had renewed acquaintance with the man who was really the key to the situation, though I did not suspect it at the time.

He and I had been strangely thrown together some years before under conditions which provoked rather an intimate knowledge of each other, and when we met on the street one day the recognition was instant and mutual. He did not inquire into my business, but simply asked what name I was traveling under, in order that he might not embarrass me. He stood in close and confidential relation to Tewfik Pasha, the Khedive, and on that account it is best that there should be no hint, even now, as to his name.



CAPTAIN GEORGE B. BOYNTON

As I was enjoying my after-dinner cigar one evening in a quiet corner of the garden in front of the hotel I was approached by three women peddlers, apparently of the fellah class. They wore the common blue kimona-like garment, held together seemingly by luck, and their small black veils were thrown over their heads, leaving their faces bare and thus placing them outside the pale of Egyptian respectability. I was about to walk away to avoid their pestering when my eyes met those of the one who was in the lead, and instantly I was attracted in place of being repelled.

Her sparkling eyes, turned full on me and ignoring all else, told me as plainly as words could have done that she had some message for me, and, suspecting that the moment for which I had been waiting for weeks had arrived, I walked slowly toward her, as though in a mood to barter. As we met, seemingly somewhat disconcerted by my steady gaze of profound and unconcealed admiration, she drew her uncouth veil across her face and held out her hands, like one trained to tourist trade, that I might examine her wonderful rings. Those hands could never have known work, they were so soft and small; and arms more perfectly rounded were never modeled in marble by a master. Plainly this woman was not of the servant class, to which her companions as clearly belonged.

One of her hands was half closed, and as she laid it in mine it opened and a small piece of folded paper fell into my palm. Long accustomed to ways out of the ordinary, I gave no sign beyond an involuntary start which she felt, but no one else noticed, and proceeded, with much deliberation, to select a ring which I purchased as a souvenir of our first meeting. Not a word passed between us except as to the price of the ring, over which there was no haggling.

The women who were with her made a pretense of showing me their wares, but it was only a show for the benefit of any inquisitive persons who might be watching and, without urging me to buy, they passed on.

Curious as to the contents of the communication which had come to me so strangely, but fearful of being watched by I knew not whom, it was some time before I went to my room to read the note by the light of a tallow candle. The mysterious missive read:

"You are Captain Boynton. Are you willing to undertake a difficult and perhaps dangerous mission? Answer tomorrow night through the channel by which you receive this."

Here was a romantic promise of something new and real in the way of excitement, for I could imagine nothing stereotyped growing out of such an unusual beginning, and I rejoiced.

Inasmuch as the only man in Cairo who knew me as Captain Boynton, and who was acquainted with my favorite occupation, was a confidant of the Khedive, it naturally occurred to me that the oily Tewfik Pasha was mixed up in it some way, and I suspected that it involved another secret movement against British rule in Egypt. The latter suspicion was soon verified, and there never has been any doubt in my own mind that I was equally correct in the conjecture as to the participation, or at least the silent approval, of Tewfik.

The next evening, before going down to dinner, I wrote my reply:

"Yes, provided it is something a gentleman can do, and I am well paid for it. But I will conduct no negotiations in this way. I must see the people I am doing business with."

After dinner I retired to the same out-of-the-way corner of the garden in which I had been found the night before, to await developments. It probably was not long, but it seemed hours before the same three women came up the short flight of steps running down to the street. As on the night before, it was left to Ialla to barter with me. I again took both of her hands in mine, to examine her jewelry, and as I did so I slipped into one of them the tightly folded note which I had been gripping for an hour or more.

Her jewels were much richer than those she had worn the previous evening, and as I studied their barbaric beauty I softly pressed her childish hands as the only means of conveying something of the impression she had made on me, for I did not know the extent to which the other women were in our secret or could be trusted. Her only response was one quick glance, which I interpreted as a mixture of pleasure, surprise and interrogation; the one distinctly pleasant thing about it was that it contained nothing of indignation or hostility.

There was no sign of either Ialla or her two friends the next evening, though I watched for them closely. On the second afternoon I received a call from my old friend, who undoubtedly had vouched for me to the people who had opened up the exceedingly interesting correspondence. It was apparently a casual visit, but its purpose was revealed when, in the course of a general conversation regarding the country and its ways, along which he had cleverly piloted me, he said:

"These Egyptians are a remarkable people. I have lived among them long enough to know them and to admire, particularly, their sublime religious faith and their exalted sense of honor. With their enemies, and with the travelers on whom they prey, they are tricky and evasive to the last degree, but in their dealings with people whom they know and trust they are the most honorable men in the world. I don't know whether you expect to have any dealings with them, but if you do, you can trust them absolutely."

With that opening I was on the point of speaking to him about the note I had received and answered, but before I could say a word he had started off on another subject, leaving me to understand that he knew all about the matter but did not wish to talk of it, and that he had taken that method, learned from the diplomats, of endorsing the people with whom he had put me in communication. I took my accustomed seat in the garden that evening, impatient for further unfoldings. I had not been waiting long when Ialla and her two companions appeared and came straight toward me, but without any sign of recognition. As she passed closely beside me, walking slowly, Ialla whispered, almost in my ear:

"Follow me at ten o'clock!"

A few minutes before ten I descended into the street to wait for them, so it could not be seen from the hotel that I was following them. Promptly on the hour Ialla and her attendants came down the steps and set off toward Old Cairo.

They led me almost the full length of the Mooshka, turned into one of the narrow side streets, then into another and another until they stopped at last in front of a door at the side of one of the little shops.

When I was within perhaps fifty feet of them Ialla entered the door, after looking back at me, while her four companions walked rapidly on down the street. I pushed open the door, which was immediately closed by a servant who dropped a bar across it, and found Ialla waiting for me in a dimly lighted hallway. She led me nearly to the end of the long hall, opened a door and motioned to me to enter, and closed the door from the outside. I found myself in a large room, which, after my eyes had become accustomed to the half-light, I saw was magnificently furnished. A fine-looking old Arab, with gray hair and beard, was seated on an ottoman, smoking a hubble-bubble pipe. His [illegible] easy identification he will be known here as Regal, though that was not his name.

"I am glad to see you, Boynton Pasha," was his greeting, in a deep, strong voice. He proved himself a man of action and advanced himself greatly in my esteem by giving no time to idle chatter. "We know you well," he said, "through trustworthy information, as a soldier and a sailor, and we believe you are peculiarly well equipped for the work we wish you to undertake. It is a sea-going expedition, involving danger of disaster on one hand and the cause of liberty and a substantial reward on the other. Are you willing to attempt it?"

"If you are open to reasonable terms and I am given full command of the expedition I will gladly undertake it," I replied. "If it furnishes real adventure I will be quite willing to accept that in part payment for my services."

Without further ceremony he let me into the whole plot. At the bottom of it was the old cry of "Egypt for the Egyptians," which is not yet dead and probably will not die for centuries, if ever. It was Arabi Pasha who had made the last desperate fight under this slogan, and it was his release from exile that was sought by the plotters, in order that he could renew the war for native liberty.

Through spies it had been learned that Arabi was confined at a point near the coast only a short distance from Colombo, the capital of Ceylon. He was allowed considerable freedom, within certain prescribed limits, and was in the custody of only a small guard. His escape was regarded as impossible, and the idea that an attempt might be made to rescue him seemingly never entered the minds of those responsible for his safe-keeping.

Yet that was precisely what I was asked to accomplish.

I promptly assured the old patriot, whose anxiety and excitement were shown in his blazing eyes, that I would cheerfully assume responsibility for Arabi's rescue and his safe delivery at almost any point that might be designated.

With a gesture which indicated that everything was settled in his mind and that it was necessary for me only to name my terms to have them agreed to, Regal said he anticipated no difficulty on that point and suggested that I return the next afternoon or evening to meet his associates, the inner circle of the revolutionary party.

Regal was waiting for me and with him were five of his countrymen.

It was urged by them and agreed that I should take no part in the actual rescue of Arabi, but remain on the ship to guard against any surprise by water and to be ready to steam westward as soon as the party returned. I was to stand in close to the shore just after dark, with all lights doused, and it was thought that Arabi would be safe on board long before sunrise so that we could be well clear of the land by daybreak.

When I finally started back to my hotel Ialla and her attendants were waiting for me in the alley, for it was not wide enough to be called a street. They started on ahead, but we had gone only a few short blocks when her four companions walked briskly away and she waited for me in a deep shadow.

"How did your business turn out?" she inquired anxiously, as I bowed low before her. Her voice, which I had been longing to hear, was soft and clear, as well became her, and her radiant beauty alone shone forth through the darkness.

"Thanks to your cleverness," I replied, "it has turned out well."

"Then you are going to rescue my uncle!" she exclaimed delightedly. Her sparkling eyes flamed with excitement and, as if to seal the compact, she extended her hand, which I first pressed and then kissed. Then I slipped it through my arm and started to walk, out of the shadow into the moonlight, and she accompanied me without protest. We walked long and talked much, and some of it was interesting.

The next night I found my way alone to Regal's abode and received the first payment of 20,000 pounds, in Paris exchange. There was a final conference, and I took my departure with many good wishes. Ialla and her two women attendants were waiting for me, as had been arranged, and my love-making [illegible] I had left off on the preceding night. Ialla was more responsive than before, but when I urged her to go with me to France or marry me at once in Cairo she would not listen. Finally she said: "After you have rescued my uncle I will go with you anywhere, but not until then will I think of marriage."

Nothing could move her from that decision. I arranged to meet her the next night and the one following, and several others, which she accomplished by the popular method of bribing her attendants, but, though it was a joy to her to be told of my love, there was no way by which she could be induced to yield to it until her uncle was free.

I went to Marseilles and, after looking over several ships that were for sale, bought L'Hirondelle, a coasting steamer of 800 tons.

At Suakin one of the great surprises of my life awaited me. We had scarcely tied up when the man from whom I was to receive the warriors came aboard with a letter from Regal directing me to turn the ship over to him and discharge the crew. The agent could not understand the change of plan any more than I could, and I could not even guess as to the cause, but he was there to obey orders, and there was nothing else for me to do. Feeling sure there would be a satisfactory explanation waiting for me at Cairo, I returned there, after paying off the crew and sending them back to Marseilles and London in charge of Leigh and Wilson.

I was still more mystified when, on reaching Cairo, I was unable to find Regal, Ialla or any one else connected with the undertaking, nor could I get the slightest trace of them.

In the hope of seeing Ialla again, and determined to secure some definite clue as to just what had happened in my absence, I waited around for two weeks or more, until I encountered the old friend who, I knew, was responsible for my connection with the conspiracy. I did not dissemble, as I had before, but took him to my room, told him the riddle and asked him the answer. I did not expect him to admit anything and was not disappointed. He said, in substance:

"Of course I know nothing about the plot of which you have told me. If what you say is true, I should say that you have been making something of a fool of yourself over this Ialla and that you have only yourself to blame for the abrupt ending which seems to have been reached. These women are the greatest flirts in the world.

"You thought Ialla was in love with you, but she was only having a good time with you, and she has taken a lot of pride in telling her friends about your meetings, at their afternoon gatherings for the exchange of gossip. She had no idea of marrying you, an unbeliever, you can be sure. It may be she thought she was stimulating you to deeds of heroism, but, if she considered that at all, it was a secondary matter.

"The men you were dealing with have the contempt of their race for all women. They can not understand how any man can become so enamored of a woman, no matter how beautiful, as to let it interfere with his business.

"They would argue that no man who could be relied on to carry out their plan would display such lack of judgment. It is possible that there may be some other reason for the situation in which you find yourself, but I doubt it. The wisest course for you is to tell me how you can be reached, and leave Cairo, for you can gain nothing by staying here. It is known to many people that I know you, and if any one should want to get in communication with you I will be able to tell him how to do it."

Possessing all the pride of a full-blooded man, I resented the calm assertion that I had been ensnared by a flirt, but, in looking back at it now, I am willing to admit that probably my friend was right about it.

Feeling that for once my destiny had played it a bit low down on me, I crossed the Mediterranean and took a French liner for New York.

Eleven years later Arabi was pardoned and returned to Egypt, but his influence among his own people was gone; the fact that he had accepted a pardon implied, to their astute minds, a secret agreement with their enemies, and caused him to be regarded as a tool of the British. But the fires of freedom are still burning, and now and again signal-smoke is ascending over India.

UNIQUE ROPE BRIDGE

Crude Device Is Used to Cross Tibet Stream.

Rivers Are So Wide and the Walls So Precipitous That It Is Impossible to Find Foundations for Structures.

Lhasse, Tibet.—One of the most fascinating things met with in Tibet is the single-rope bridge—fascinating, and yet at first sight rather alarming. To shoot swiftly across a thundering river suspended many feet in the air by two leather thongs from a short wooden slider which hums over the knotted surface of a rope made of twisted strands of bamboo, seems more precarious than it really is, and after the first journey one thoroughly enjoys the experience. Whoever the ingenious native was who first suggested this mode of crossing a river—he probably came from the jungles of Assam and had seen monkeys crossing the river there by means of growing creepers—there is no doubt that he found the one method which is applicable to the big rivers, exaggerated mountain torrents, of eastern Tibet and far western China. The obvious way for natives to cross a river is by canoe, but, unfortunately, neither the Salween nor the Mekong, big as they are, are navigable even for canoes in Tibet. The single-way rope bridge overcomes every difficulty. Two small platforms are made, one on either side of the river, one high up, the other 20 or 30 feet lower down; stout posts are driven into the rock and the bamboo rope is slung across from post to post, and tightened so that it slopes steeply from one bank to the other. The slider consists of a half-cylinder of wood, about three inches in diameter, having two slots cut in its upper surface, one at either end, through which pass the leather thongs; to these thongs the man, baggage or animal is tied, so that he hangs just beneath the rope, and, being pushed off the platform, the slider carries him safely over the river. It will be seen, therefore, that two ropes are necessary at each crossing, one for going each way. The advantages of such a system are obvious. The rope is cheap to make and the materials are ready to hand; it is quickly put in place, and, though it will not stand the wear and tear of constant use for very long, it can be replaced in a few hours. It can be suspended so high above the river that it is completely out of reach of summer floods, but very often it is only a few feet above the water at its lowest point, and such ropes are under water and impassable during the summer. On the other hand, I have seen ropes as much as a hundred feet above the river; they look rather alarming, but, as a matter of fact, it would make no difference whether one fell one hundred feet or five feet into such a river as the Mekong in Tibet. After a few weeks' use the rope begins to sag at the lower end and may require tightening up, especially if animals are being slung across; a man can pull himself up the last few feet, hand over hand, or haul up a box which has got stuck, but an animal is helpless unless he lands right on the opposite bank. Hundreds of these single-way rope bridges are in use on the Mekong and Salween rivers alone, and they occur a long way east of this on the La-lung and Li-tang rivers, and many others. But I have never seen one on the Yangtze, which is too big a river.—F. Kingdom Ward, in Country Life.

Boy Scouts at Work on New Task

THAT LOOKS LIKE SOME KIND OF AN INSECT—

WASHINGTON.—Boy Scouts of America are doing a piece of real and extremely useful scouting. They are searching for trees that are afflicted with disease or insects. This work was started in Pennsylvania, where a disease is destroying thousands of chestnut trees.

The boys have been of great help to the forestry department in detecting this disease and reporting the trees thus afflicted to the department of forestry.

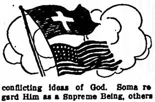
That work afforded an excellent piece of scouting for boys and the result has been that boy scouts throughout the country have written to James E. West, chief scout executive of the Boy Scouts of America, asking for information about other diseases and insects that affect trees and shrubs.

They wanted something definite to look for in their hikes.

As a result George H. Merritt, one of the secretaries employed by the Boy Scouts of America, is compiling with the aid of Gifford Pinchot, former United States forester and member of the National Council of the Boy Scouts of America, a chapter for the manual and for the scoutmasters outlining different diseases of the most significant trees.

"Among the most destructive insects," said Merritt, "must be enumerated the bark lice or scale insects, plant lice, wood borers, coddling moth, San Jose scale, tent caterpillars, canker worms, tussockmoths, leaf-mining beetles, gall-forming insects, chinch-bugs, army worms, weevils and locusts. Aside from this army of destruction to forest and orchard tree alike, and to the lesser plants, there are also causes of loss due to such agents as fungus, animals, weather conditions, etc."

Emblem of Church Should Be First



A CHURCH flag is the emblem and standard of God, and to place it above the flag of the United States during religious services aboard a vessel is but little enough recognition of God, it was asserted the other day by Dr. E. M. Blackwell, of the navy.

"I have noticed that certain parties object to the church pennant being hoisted above the national flag on board ship of the navy during divine services, stating in effect that there is nothing paramount to the national flag," Dr. Blackwell said.

"As regards other nations and flags and other human organizations, I fully agree that there is nothing paramount to the United States or its flag, but there is a Supreme Power or Force that is paramount to everything earthly, and the emblem of that Supreme Power or Force, when hoisted, should be hoisted above every other flag or emblem.

"As I understand it, the church flag, whether Christian, Jew, Buddhist, Brahman, Confucian, Mahommedan, or what not, is the emblem and standard of God to that religion and not of the religion itself.

"Different nations and peoples have conflicting ideas of God. Some regard Him as a Supreme Being, others as the great Force or Power of the universe or nature; but, however we regard Him, we should recognize Him as the great unmeasurable, overmastering, all-powerful, irresistible Force that rules the universe.

"Men and nations at various times have arrogated to themselves that they were supreme over earth, and have had their answers by being wiped out of existence, so that there is not a vestige left of them.

"As a great majority of the people of this country acknowledge the Christian faith, and as Christian people practically rule the world, the church pennant is certainly the one we should use as representing that great Being to whom we owe allegiance."

Illicit Distilling Is on the Increase

TH' OFFICERS ARE COMIN'!!

MOONSHINING—the act of manufacturing distilled liquors in violation of the internal revenue law—is on the increase all over the country, according to experts of the treasury department. Of course, the department never concerns itself with questions of public policy, and consequently it has nothing to do or say about the increase or decrease of prohibition throughout the United States. Nevertheless the work of the bureau of internal revenue is immediately concerned with this question of public policy, because it has been found that wherever prohibition laws exist there also is afforded the greatest possible incentive for violations of the internal revenue laws by "moonshiners."

It will be some weeks yet before the report of the work of internal revenue agents with respect to the enforcement of the laws against "moonshining" will be compiled for the last fiscal year, but enough is known to warrant the statement that there has not only been a great increase, but a great spread of that industry in the last fiscal year.

The greatest increase in this illegal business in recent years has been noted in Georgia, Alabama, North Carolina, South Carolina, Virginia and Tennessee. While the internal revenue officers have been constantly raiding the districts where the illicit industry has been known to exist for half a century or more, a backfire has sprung up in the settled districts of those states which has necessitated an increase in the force of inspectors.

Furthermore, the "moonshining" industry has begun to invade the north, and particularly some of the larger cities of the north, where the possibility of hiding is excellent.

U. S. Treasury Department Greatest

THERE is no institution on earth that handles as much money as the treasury department of the United States government. It collects and expends all moneys authorized to be collected and expended by congress. It advises congress as to the amount of money necessary to run the government for each fiscal year. It mints the coin, prints the paper money as well as the postage and revenue stamps.

Among the other activities of this great department of government is the protection of the people from counterfeiters; the maintenance of vessels to suppress smuggling and to enforce quarantine regulations, to save life, to conserve the public health, construct and maintain public buildings all over the country, and audit and pay the accounts of all the other departments of the government. It also controls and supervises the national banking system, comprising some 8,000 banks, with a capital of a billion dollars and a surplus of $700,000,000.

Since the administration of President Washington the treasury portfolio has been held by 44 individuals. Seventeen states have furnished all the men who have presided over the treasury department down to and including the present incumbent. They have come from various sections of the country. Geographically the north Atlantic division of states supplied nearly one-half; 21 came from the states embraced in that division. The north central division of states was represented by 12; the south central by 6 and the south Atlantic by 5. The western division of states as yet have not been called upon for [illegible]

WHO'S WHO and Why

SCOTT DID REACH THE POLE

The latest news in regard to Captain Scott's South Pole expedition has been brought by Herbert G. Ponting, the first member of the expedition to return to London. Ponting is a widely known traveler. He accompanied Captain Scott's party as a photographer. He says he accompanied Captain Scott for some miles into the great barrier the night the explorer started on his march toward the pole when he left him. Mr. Ponting took cinematograph pictures of the party as they disappeared in the distance in the vast desert of ice. Captain Scott, he says, was then about seven hundred miles from the pole.

Ponting says there is little doubt that Scott reached the pole about January 15, because when Lieutenant Evans left him January 4 he was only 145 miles from the pole with ample food supplies and all other necessaries. He was then traveling about fifteen miles a day and should have reached the pole ten days later. Ponting continues:

"Captain Scott was due back where we were waiting for him with the Terra Nova March 15, or earlier, but the sea froze up rapidly and March 15 we believed it unwise to remain any longer. No news can now be received of Captain Scott until March, 1913.

DR. WILEY FAVORS KISSING

Dr. Harvey W. Wiley, pure food expert and former chief of the bureau of chemistry, department of agriculture, is acquiring an elaborate handle to his name. It is no longer just plain "Doc" Wiley. When you address the illustrious food expert now you must say "Hon. Harvey W. Wiley, M. D., Sc. D."

He is really all of that. Only a few days ago he was all of this minus three letters. Those letters were "Sc. D." They were conferred upon the food expert the other day as an honorary degree by Lafayette college, at Easton, Pa. Those three little letters mean that Dr. Wiley is a doctor of science.

Dr. Wiley returned from Easton to the national capital safely with the new handle to his name. The other night he showed, however, that he was the same Dr. Wiley, regardless of the appendage to his name, by expressing his views upon the subject of prohibitory osculation, which is now worrying many of the lovers of the Capital City.

Dr. Wiley is utterly opposed to the movement on foot for the abolition of kissing on the ground that it is a menace to public health.

"Prohibit kissing?" queried the food expert. "Oh, no! I'm not in favor of that procedure by any means. I don't want osculation prohibited while I am living. I don't care what they do when I am dead."

HEIRESS FINDS A REAL MAN

Miss Lilia B. Gilbert, heiress to the $15,000,000 estate left by her father, H. Brandhell Gilbert, has found her ideal man and her engagement to Howard Price Renshaw, son of a millionaire manufacturer of Troy, has been announced.

Miss Gilbert, who is one of the most beautiful and popular young women of New York society, has been wooed by many men, but none of them was accepted because he did not meet the specifications of a perfect husband, as laid down by Miss Gilbert herself.

"How much better it would be," Miss Gilbert is reported to have said, "if every girl would carefully formulate her ideal and then paste it up prominently where the right man could come along and see it. What a lot of trouble and disappointment would be saved."

Here is the type Miss Gilbert insisted upon:

He must be 6 feet tall, a brunette and fond of athletics, a good rider and fond of animals; clean shaven, with a firm jaw and ears close to his head; a Republican and a money maker.

He must have thick curly hair—not red—over his left ear, a straight nose, large and intelligent eyes, but not soulful ones.

MISS IDE'S WEDDING GIFTS

Colonel and Mrs. Leslie [illegible]

Society, both in this country and abroad, was greatly interested in the marriage recently of Miss Marjorie Ide, daughter of Henry C. Ide, American minister to Spain, to Shane Leslie, son of Col. and Mrs. John Leslie of New York, and grandson of Sir John and Lady Constance Leslie of Castle Leslie, Glaslough, Ireland. The ceremony was performed at the country home of the brother-in-law and sister of the bride, Mr. and Mrs. W. Bourke Cockran, Sands Point, L. I. Not in years has any bride, outside royal circles, received so remarkable a collection of gifts as that presented Miss Ide. From King Alfonso and Queen Victoria of Spain came autographed photographs and an old Spanish fan, a piece from the Royal museum. The President and Mrs. Taft sent a large silver basket and Miss Helen Taft a silver tea caddy. [illegible] presents are a diamond [illegible] brooch and bonds from [illegible] of diamonds and pearls.

HAPPENINGS IN THE CITIES

Goat That Leads Sheep to Slaughter

KANSAS CITY, MO.—The goat is not a beautiful animal in the face. He hasn't a sweet disposition. He isn't playful. He won't cuddle. But he has his uses.

Frank E. Essex of a local grain and milling company, who raises thousands of sheep and goats on his farm near Raytown, says a goat is the most contrariwise animal ever invented. Everything goes contrary with him—like Mrs. Gummidge. But like Mrs. Gummidge he has a pretty good heart if you can get on the right side of him.

Mr. Essex has one particular goat on his place that is the best and the worst goat that ever lived. Sometimes Mr. Essex gets so allfired mad at him that he longs to take a club and kill him. But every time he raises his hand to slay him he thinks of the many kindnesses the goat has done him, and his heart relents.

"But, really, I hadn't ought to knock that goat," Mr. Essex said. "Sheep, you know, haven't a lick of sense. If it wasn't for that goat I don't know how we'd ever get them into a stock car. But the goat knows how. Frankly, I don't believe he does it to help me—I think he does it because he knows the sheep are going to the packing house to be made into broth, and it fills his wicked heart with gladness.

"Anyway, this is what he does: When the car is placed and the chute run down to the pen he takes the lead and marches up into the car, the sheep following. He marches all around the car and back to the door, where he stops. There he places himself in such a way as to block the exit, leaving only enough room for the sheep to enter. They crowd in until the car is full, and then the goat leaps nimbly out.

"If you could see the wicked gleam in his eye when he has thus trapped his trusting followers and saved his own skin you would appreciate how nearly human is his duplicity.

Expected Spanking, Acclaimed Hero

ATLANTIC CITY, N. J.—The troubled conscience of Harold Isaac, twelve years old, of 23 Bartlett avenue, led him to make a confession to his mother the other day. He fully expected to be spanked. Instead, he was acclaimed a hero.

Harold went over to Linwood park, ten miles from here, on the annual picnic of the St. Nicholas church. Before he left his mother admonished him not to go near the water. He gave his solemn promise.

The youngster is an expert in the water and later in the afternoon he left the picnic grounds and strolled about to Bargaintown lake. Several of his boy chums were disporting in the water.

A few minutes later, George Kloris, a boy of twelve and his particular "pal," got into deep water and could not make land, despite his game fight. He started to drift away and the other youngsters, badly frightened when they saw he was drowning, scampered ashore, grabbed their clothes and started on a run to summon help.

The drowning boy called to Harold to save him.

Then he could stand it no longer. He kicked off his shoes, plunged and battled for ten minutes and had just succeeded in dragging the unconscious form ashore when some of the other boys returned. Then he led the work of resuscitation and was finally rewarded. George opened his eyes and gradually became himself once more and by the time Harold's clothes had dried he was almost recovered. Right there young Isaac made every one of his chums swear that they would not tell about his plunge in the water. They promised and kept "mum." But finally the youngster's conscience troubled him, and he could hold in no longer. He told his mother he had been in the water, and stopped there ready to take his punishment. But young Kloris overheard the confession and told the real story. Now Harold is the happiest kid in town.

Eat? Wasted Time, Say Keep Wellers

I JUST ATE A PEANUT AND I FEEL LIKE I COULD LICK MY WEIGHT IN WILD CATS

CLEVELAND, O.—Why eat?

Members of the Keep Well club, who told their experiences at a foodless picnic the other day in Wade park, declared a man can go without nourishment for thirty days and feel like a bear cat, and that it is simple and delightful to exist for eight months on a daily ration of eight quarts of milk.

The club members advise any one with a stomacheche to quit eating for awhile. It is fun after three days, declared Dr. C. M. Swingle, who has tried it.

How to be strong as a bull moose and still eat nothing was told at the picnic by A. G. Freeman, who once went without food for eighteen days straight. S. P. Brooks is the milk diet fiend.

If you backslide, you may do as some of the Keep-Wellers do, and devour a hearty lunch. The menu might be:

One peanut.
One orange.
One lettuce leaf.

"Once I went eight months without nourishment except eight quarts of milk a day," said Brooks. "I gained forty pounds. Since then I have lived on milk for varying periods."

Swingle said that it is easy to go without food for short periods. He said that after the first three days the appetite leaves.

"I went without food for eleven days and could carry a market basket without being tempted to eat," said Swingle.

Swingle said milk and lemons is a diet that is good for tuberculars.

Cat Shatters Governor's Resolution

INDIANAPOLIS, IND.—Gov. Thomas R. Marshall's resolution to spend July 4 behind the locked doors of his offices in the statehouse were shattered early in the morning on account of the governor's admiration for "Tom," a big, black cat, the capitol mascot.

Tom was not responsible directly for the governor's throwing open the doors of his executive offices. A friend of the Democratic nominee for the vice-presidency, knowing that the cat was admired by the governor, imitated the sound of a cat scratching against the door of the private office until Marshall was greeted by a crowd of late arrivals from the Baltimore convention. They gained access to the room to congratulate the governor by imitating the scratching of a cat when loud knocking had failed.

The governor was engaged in dictating his decisions on the numerous petitions for pardons, when a crowd began to congregate at the doors of the executive offices. Frequent poundings and shouted requests for entrance were unheeded.

The crowd was asked to remain quiet. The governor, seated at his desk, with large pile of congratulatory telegrams and letters before him, became aware of the silence in the corridors and believed the crowd had dispersed. Then came the gentle scraping as if of claws against wood, and the governor, desiring the presence of Tom in the room, threw open the doors, only to be greeted by the shouts and laughter of more than a score of his Hoosier admirers.

TEACHING OF SALESMANSHIP.

Chicago has begun an interesting experiment in its technical high school. A course in salesmanship is offered to young women, and the Chicago department stores are permitting some of their employes to attend it during what would otherwise be working hours, not only paying their salaries for the whole time, but also paying their carfare to and from the school. This is like the work which is being done in technical schools in parts of Germany, where boys and girls have a certain number of hours a week free from work and receive instruction in the work at which they are employed. Employers in Germany, where the system has been established for some time, co-operate just as gladly as Chicago employers are said to be co-operating in the present experiment. They are reported as finding it to their advantage to do so. It is easy to see why a good many, especially of the larger employers of labor, should find it to their advantage here as well as there. Take the case of salesmanship, which is being taught in Chicago. Some large stores have so strongly felt the need of instruction in it that they have established schools of salesmanship of their own where experts lecture and give advice to ambitious employes. In this way it is possible to develop better salesmen and saleswomen.

Perhaps no woman in Tennessee is doing a more practical and helpful work than Miss Virginie Pearl Moore, who is at the head of the School Improvement work of the state, and who has recently been appointed by the Bureau of Education of the United States, organizer for Tennessee of girls' tomato clubs. For some time the United States government, through its bureau of education, has been encouraging boys to take an interest in agricultural activities by the organization of corn clubs, potato clubs, etc., and now the department, realizing that the girls must be kept on the farm, as well as the boys, is organizing tomato clubs among the girls all over the country. Miss Moore has been appointed state organizer of these clubs in Tennessee, and though she only received her appointment a few months ago, there are now about 1,000 Tennessee girls enrolled in the various tomato clubs of the state, says the Knoxville Journal and Tribune. The object of the work is to afford girls in the rural districts an intelligent interest and an income, that they may be kept on the farms happy and satisfied instead of coming to the city where they join the anemic procession of mill and shop girls.

What is perhaps the most remarkable graveyard in the United States adjoins the old Spanish church in the ancient Indian pueblo of Acoma, N. M., and took over forty years to construct, says the Wide World. The village is situated high in the air upon a huge, flat-topped rock many acres in extent and entirely bare of soil. In order to create the graveyard it was necessary to carry up the earth from the plain 300 feet below, a blanketful at a time, on the backs of Indians who had to climb with their heavy loads up a precipitous trail cut in the face of the cliff. The graveyard thus laboriously constructed, is held in place on three sides by high retaining walls of stone.

UP TO LEGISLATURE

ATTORNEY GENERAL HOLDS THAT DENEEN CANNOT APPOINT NEW SENATOR.

SAYS NO VACANCY EXISTS

Under Lea Resolution the 1909 Election Was Invalid, the Legislature Alone Having the Power to Act, Says Stead.

Springfield, Ill., July 19.—Attorney General Stead, in a voluminous opinion, rendered to the governor Wednesday, holds that the unseating of Senator Lorimer creates no vacancy and Governor Deneen has no power to appoint a successor.

Whether a special session of the legislature will be called at once so that Lorimer's successor may be elected has not been decided. Governor Deneen declined to discuss this phase of the situation. He said he had not decided what he would do.

In contending there is no vacancy within the meaning of the Constitution, Attorney General Stead cites as analogous the cases of Lee Mantle of Montana and Matthew S. Quay of Pennsylvania. Mantle had served a full term, but the Montana legislature, though in session and legally organized, failed to elect his successor. The state executive proceeded to appoint, contending there was a vacancy, but the federal senate decided that the legislature's failure to elect did not create a vacancy as constitutionally considered. The facts in the Quay case are substantially the same.

The opinion incidentally sets forth that the senate "investigation was not to inquire into the conduct of Mr. Lorimer as senator. It did not expel him, but it determined that his election was invalid," and therefore, technically, there had been no election.

Widow Charges That Accused Members of New York Police Force Killed Him.

New York, July 18.—Herman Rosenthal, proprietor of a gambling house, who was to have amplified to District Attorney Whitman a story told a few days ago, charging certain police officials with grafting and oppression, is dead at the morgue here with five bullets in his head.

While the police are holding a man who says his name is Louis Bibby, as the driver of the automobile from which five men shot Rosenthal to death, the latter's widow puts the assassination squarely up to the police. The eye-witnesses of the shooting declare that at least one policeman was in the automobile when the shots were fired.

SENATE HITS AT TAFT

WAS REBUKED WHEN BAILEY RESOLUTION IS ADOPTED.

Southern Senator Bitterly Assails Chief Executive—Attacks Colonel Roosevelt.

Washington, July 18.—The senate by a vote of 35 to 23 adopted a modification of Senator Bailey's resolution declaring any attempt on the part of a president to influence the vote of any senator upon any question a violation of the spirit of the Constitution, after a discussion which lasted nearly the entire day Tuesday.

The question was prompted by President Taft's interference in the Lorimer case as shown by his letter to Theodore Roosevelt last January and revealed in a speech he made in Boston last April.

Senator Bailey made this letter the basis of a scathing denunciation of the president for interfering with the constitutional rights of the senate and characterized the president's reference to him as a "false and infamous slander."

Senator Borah defended the president as did Senator Smith of Michigan and several others.

W. F. SHEEHAN OF NEW YORK TELLS SENATE OF DEMOCRATIC CAMPAIGN FUND.

TRUST MONEY WAS BARRED

Chairman of Executive Committee Declares Check for $10,000 From Sugar Corporation Was Returned to the Donor.

Washington, July 20.—When Alton B. Parker ran for president in 1904, the Democratic campaign fund contained about $1,000,000, said W. F. Sheehan of New York, who testified Thursday before the senate committee investigating campaign funds. Mr. Sheehan was then chairman of the Democratic national executive committee. Money was sent by the committee, he said, to Maine, Colorado and Nebraska.

Mr. Sheehan assured the committee that sums sent to Maine, Colorado and Nebraska were not large.

"How much was sent to Nebraska?" inquired Senator Oliver.

"I think about $15,000."

"Mr. Bryan was the candidate for the senatorship that year, was he not?"

"I don't remember exactly; candidates for the senatorship were not—"

"Well, I think he was," interrupted the Pennsylvania senator.

Mr. Sheehan said he remembered August Belmont was a large contributor that year and Senator Oliver asked if Thomas F. Ryan was a contributor in the same campaign. The witness responded that he was.

Mr. Sheehan wished the committee to understand when he estimated the Democratic funds in 1904 at $1,000,000 that he was not contradicting August Belmont, who "guessed" on the stand that the amount was $600,000 or $700,000.

"It is all a matter of memory," insisted Sheehan. "I think the national committee used directly about $800,000. I think there came through the committee some contributions for specific use in New York state.

The witness declared the committee made a rule at the beginning of the campaign to accept no money from any trust.

"There was $10,000 contributed," began Mr. Sheehan, "by the American Sugar Refining company—not by Mr. Havemeyer—to the state committee. Before the check was cashed we heard about it and it was returned."

Senator Clapp asked the witness for the names of contributors of more than $5,000.

"I recollect Mr. Belmont chiefly because of his testimony," replied Mr. Sheehan. "I was up in Maine much of the time and did not have so much to do with the raising of funds. There were others who contributed more than that sum, but I cannot remember them."

AIDS DARROW'S CASE

LINCOLN STEFFENS GIVES IMPORTANT EVIDENCE.

Believed Testimony of Magazine Writer Will Be Deciding Factor in Reaching a Verdict.

Los Angeles, Cal., July 19.—Lincoln Steffens, writer on government, politics and labor and the man who was credited largely at the time with having brought about the settlement of the McNamara cases, took the stand for the defense in the bribery trial of Clarence S. Darrow, and gave impressive and in minute detail the history of the McNamaras' pleas of guilty.

Steffens testified that on Saturday before the arrest of Bert Franklin, on the following Tuesday, November 28, Darrow consented that if it was necessary in order to affect a settlement of the McNamara cases, he would let J. J. McNamara plead guilty, as well as J. B. McNamara.

Steffens testified further that this decision of Darrow was kept secret between himself and Darrow, and he went on representing to the citizens' committee, which he had interested in the peace negotiations, that Darrow would not agree to any terms that did not include the discharge of J. J. McNamara.

Further the witness testified that on Sunday, November 26, he and Darrow and former Judge Cyrus F. McNutt of the McNamara counsel, went to the county jail and disclosed the plans to the McNamaras and secured their separate consent to the plan which involved changing their pleas to guilty.

Judge McNutt died since the beginning of the Darrow trial. In consequence Steffens' testimony on these two facts, it seems, can, in the nature of things, have no other corroboration than the testimony of Darrow himself. If the jury believes Steffens, his testimony probably will become the deciding factor in the verdict.

The standing of the teams on points was:

United States	128	Denmark	11

Postmaster General Hitchcock Says Contributions Four Years Ago on File—Du Pont Offer Spurned.

Washington, July 19.—Postmaster General Frank H. Hitchcock on Wednesday told the senate committee investigating campaign contributions of 1904 and 1908 that the records of the funds used in President Taft's election, as filed at Albany, N. Y., were correct.

Mr. Hitchcock said the total collected through various agencies of the committee in 1908 was $1,655,518.27. Of this amount $620,150 was collected in various states and handled by the state committees.

No contribution was received from a corporation, Mr. Hitchcock said, because congress had just passed a law prohibiting it.

SPLENDID OUTLOOK FOR CROPS IN WESTERN CANADA

RELIABLE INFORMATION FROM THE GRAIN FIELDS SHOW THAT THE PROSPECTS ARE GOOD.

This is the time of year when considerable anxiety is felt in all the northern agricultural districts as to the probable outcome of the growing crops. Central Canada, comprising the Provinces of Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta, with their 16,000,000 acres of wheat, oats, barley and flax, of which 6,000,000 acres may be said to be sown to wheat alone, has become a great factor in the grain markets of the world. Besides this, government returns show that every state in the Union has representatives in these provinces, and naturally the friends of these representatives are anxious to hear of their success. It has never been said of that country that it is absolutely faultless. There are, and have been, districts that have experienced the vagaries of the weather, the same as in districts south of the boundary line between the two countries, but these are only such as are to be expected in any agricultural country. The past has proven that the agricultural possibilities of this portion of Canada are probably more attractive in every way than most countries where grain raising is the chief industry. The present year promises to be even better than past years, and in a month or six weeks it is felt there will be produced the evidence that warrants the enthusiasm of the present. Then these great broad acres will have the ripened wheat, oats, barley and flax, and the farmer, who has been looking forward to making his last payment on his big farm will be satisfied. At the time of writing, all crops give the promise of reaching the most sanguine expectations.

In the central portion of Alberta, it is said that crop conditions are more favorable than in any previous year. Heavy rains recently visited this part, and the whole of this grain growing section has been covered. Reports like the following come from all parts:

"Splendid heavy rain yesterday. Crops forging ahead. Great prospects. All grains more than a week ahead of last year. Weather warm last week. Good rains last night."

From southern Alberta the reports to hand indicate sufficient rain. Crops in excellent condition. Labor scarce.

Throughout Saskatchewan all grains are looking well, and there has been sufficient rain to carry them through to harvest.

From all portions of Manitoba there comes an assurance of an abundant yield of all grains. Throughout southern Manitoba, where rain was needed a few weeks ago, there has lately been abundant precipitation, and that portion of the province will in all probability have a crop to equal the best anticipations. A large quantity of grain was sown on the stubble in the newer west, which is never a satisfactory method of farming, and may reduce the general average.

Taken altogether, the country is now fully two weeks in advance of last year, and in all grains the acreages sown are much larger than in 1911. This means that with auspicious weather the west will have the grandest harvest in its history. Two hundred and fifty million bushels of wheat has been mentioned as an estimate of the present growing crop, and it looks now as if that guess will be none too large.

That Hole in the Fence

By GRACE KERRIGAN

(Copyright, 1912, by Associated Literary Press.)

"Now, then, my dear, tell me all about it."

Aunt Hetty had arrived from Michigan on a visit to her sister, and this was the second day after. She had asked her niece, Miss May Clyde, to take a seat with her under the blossoming apple tree, and she had put an arm around her as she said the words.

"All about what?" was innocently asked.

"Stuff! Don't pretend you don't know. You are twenty years old and haven't had a proposal yet. Why not?"

"I'm too homely."

"Shucks! If I had you out in Michigan I'd have you married off in a month. The fellows around here must be working for about a dollar a day."

"Do you want my reasons in chronological order, aunty?" May asked after a sigh had escaped on the blossom-laden air.

"We don't have that word out in Michigan, but you can go right ahead."

"Well, at the tender age of sixteen I fell in love with a boy that drew me on his hand-sled. I found he was also drawing other girls, and I banished him from my heart."

"That was what we call goose-love," said Aunt Hetty.

"Well, at seventeen I climbed a tree and couldn't get down. Great chance for romance, but it didn't come. The grocer's boy got a ladder for me, but charged 25 cents for his services. Under such circumstances I couldn't give him my heart, could I?"

"Of course not. I'd like to have that boy out in Michigan for a few weeks!"

"At eighteen I was in a field picking daisies when a bull took after me."

"Lands alive!"

"I ran screaming, and a young man in the road stopped and—"

"He scaled the fence and broke that bull's neck," finished the aunt.

"No. In running after me the bull stumbled and broke his own neck, and Miss May Went Wandering Along That Fence.

the young man went on without our having spoken a word to each other. Wasn't it a shameful case?"

"We'd surely call it so out in Michigan."

"Then at nineteen, at a summer resort, a canoe upset with me."

"You don't say!"

"Yes, aunty. I was paddling around and showing off before a lot of people when I got the flip-flop. Canoe just turned over and left me in the water."

"And it was a mile deep?"

"I thought so."

"And you couldn't swim?"

"Not a kick. Of course the people all saw it, and of course I screamed."

"And a dozen young men fell over each other to plunge in to rescue you?"

"No, aunty. All the young men had gone to a game of ball, and the only man present had a wooden leg and was bald-headed. He couldn't come to my rescue, but he hollered to me to wade ashore."

"But how could you?"

"Oh, the water was only two feet deep!"

"It wasn't, eh? I'd like to have that lake out in Michigan just one summer, and the old peg-leg with it!"

"And last fall I got to be twenty. I was riding out with a girl friend when the horse ran away. She jumped out and left me to be smashed up."

"The cowardly wretch!"

"After half a mile a young man dashed out into the highway and cried out that he would save me."

"And I'll bet a cookie to a cent that he was from Michigan!" exclaimed Aunt Hetty. "There ain't a young man in our state who wouldn't do it."

"Maybe he was a Michigander," sighed Miss May, "but I shall never know. He stubbed his toe and the [illegible] father had to pay a $40 doctor bill for him. Nothing has happened since, and how am I to get married?"

"Don't they have spelling-schools around here?" was asked.

"Never heard of any."

"Nor camp-meetings?"

"No."

"Nor 'lasses candy-pulls?"

"No."

"What a benighted country! Why, how does a girl get a fellow?"

"I don't know. You asked why I wasn't married, and I've been telling you."

"Well, we wouldn't put up with such things in Michigan a minute. We give a girl a chance out there, and somebody's getting married every minute or two. There ain't an old maid nor an old bach within 20 miles of where I live."

"But do you think my time will come some day, auntie?"

"Got to, dear—got to. Don't you despair. Put on your hat and go up to the woods I see over there and see if you can find me some wintergreen berries. We Michiganders are mighty fond of 'em."

The woods were half a mile away down the road, and were not fenced in. When one had penetrated them about 200 feet, however, there was a barbed-wire fence, and it was on the far side of this fence that Miss May saw the red berries. Even a queen can climb a rail fence or clamber over a stone wall, but there isn't a lady the whole length of Fifth avenue that can negotiate a barbed-wire fence. It takes a brave man and a long-legged man.

Miss May went wandering along that fence until she found a place where a hog had crawled through, and bent one wire up and another down, and she sank to her hands and knees and tried the same game. The barbs caught and held her, and she was still there at the end of three long hours and after she had shouted herself hoarse.

Paul Ascott had come down from the city to revel in the balmy sunshine of early summer. He had promised to kill a few squirrels for a taxidermist friend, and it was on this very afternoon that he was out with a gun in search of the little fellows. He scented the wintergreens and picked some and sat down to eat them and rejoice in the stillness around him. By and by a succession of queer sounds caused him to rise up and advance towards a certain point.

Poor May Clyde! The young man came face to face with her. He gave a start and rubbed his eyes. Never before had he seen a girl caught in the hog-hole of a fence, and he had to have time to recover. In two or three minutes he was unfastening the barbs caught in her shirtwaist and prying apart the wires, and when he finally gave her a hand to reach her feet she had to have his support for a time. She had almost lost her voice, but she managed to whisper:

"Did—did you ever do a fool thing like that?"

"We all do at times," he laughed. "I think you live in the village, and you must let me see you home."

There was no talking on the way—at least from Miss May. Mr. Ascott uttered a few words of consolation and left her at the gate, and she went in and had a good cry before she could make whispered explanations to her mother and aunt. It was the next day before her voice was strong enough to ask of the aunt:

"Wasn't it the awfulest kind of awful?"

"No, sir, it wasn't!" was the prompt reply.

"But you see—"

"I see that he'll call here this afternoon to laugh over the matter with you, and that it's going to lead to love and marriage. May, every girl has got to be found before she can be loved. She may be found up a tree—in a cave—down the well—on a haystack. You was found in the hog-hole of a barbed-wire fence, and if that isn't romantic enough to bring about a marriage then I don't know how to put up pickled peaches."

Mr. Ascott is a frequent caller at the Clyde house, and the family cook has winked at the butcher's boy and hinted that there was something doing.

STORM KILLS THREE

LIGHTNING STRIKES MERRY PARTY ON THE CLUB'S GOLF LINKS.

PROPERTY LOSS, $50,000.

Trees Uprooted, Structures Are Moved By Gale Which Reaches 84 Miles An Hour—Minneapolis Hard Hit.

Minneapolis.—Undoubtedly one of the worst storms recorded in the weather bureau records of the Twin Cities swept through Minneapolis from the south made a half circle and swept off toward St. Paul and adjoining counties, leaving in its wake three deaths, fourteen persons injured by the lightning, and a property damage estimated at $100,000. The property loss in Minneapolis is estimated at $50,000. No estimate can be made of damage done to crops in the country districts. The storm was confined chiefly to counties adjoining those of Ramsey and Hennepin.

Most of the damage was confined to the central district of Minneapolis and the suburban districts of St. Paul. Lake Minnetonka residents suffered but little damage and residence in counties north of Hennepin reported the storm abated in fury as it swept over them. The fury of the storm was spent in an hour in Minneapolis. It was preceded by light showers that sent persons skeltering for shelter and was followed by a hail storm that was soon over.

Ralph C. Gillette, eldest son of L. C. Gillette of the Minneapolis Steel and Machinery company was killed instantly while seeking shelter under a tree on the Interlachen club golf links. Dr. C. W. Card, a dentist, was knocked unconscious and was in a serious condition for a few minutes after the shock. Joe Nelson, 10 years old, a caddy l uobtsthggis,4..ec-Dcegu K., injured by the bolt of lightning that struck Mr. Gilette. He is in the club house at Interlachen under the constant attendance of two physicians. They hold but slight hopes for his recovery.

E. S. Houston, a coffee salesman, was stunned by the same bolt but recovered shortly. Another caddy was knocked down but recovered before any others of the party.

The party started from the Interlachen club house to play the course after the fury of the storm had passed.

The storm swept generally over the South Side, snatching up a roof here, or a barn there. Rain swept in sheets across the streets, blinding those unfortunate enough to be out in it and making it impossible to see across the street. Many persons were badly frightened and believed that a tornado was upon them. Basements were filled with water which flooded the streets the manholes being soon clogged up so there was no place where it could be drained off.

During the worst part of the storm, street cars were forced to stop, many being unable to find the switches because of the water.

The delivery wagon belonging to the Martin grocery was standing at Fortieth street and Chicago avenue when the storm burst. A strong gust of wind seized it, and rolling the horse and wagon over and over carried it across the street and dumped it down a steep incline into a ditch. The horse was not injured, and the wagon escaped almost intact. The driver, Ralph Kueken, when the wind struck the wagon, made one leap, and landed safely in the road.

ST. PAUL IS ACCUSED.

Negro Convention Fights Over the Credentials.

St. Paul.—The old Capitol in St. Paul represented a miniature Chicago convention following the seating of forty-three delegates from Minnesota to the Negro National Educational congress by the committee on credentials. The constitution provides that not more than fifteen delegates shall be appointed from any state, and Governor Eberhart of Minnesota, the committee reported, had appointed forty-three. Pandemonium reigned for several minutes while various delegations shouted for recognition from the floor; charges of trying to gain control of the congress flew thick and fast, while a few even went so far as to suggest a separate convention; but finally the visitors permitted the Gopher delegates to take their seats "just to show the white people a lesson on how to run a convention."

The trouble started when A. S. Jackson of Waco, Tex., commissioner and secretary of education of the African Methodist Episcopal church, objected to the "future dangers" to the convention if the policy of the St. Paul colored people in "packing" the convention were followed. The Twin City delegation deeply resented the suggestion of fraud. Mr. Jackson and his friends withdrew their objections and harmony prevailed.

A bitter attack on those who publicly denounce the black race and naming Thomas Dixon, the author, Senator Tillman and Governor Vardaman and Davis, among others, was made by Rev. R. H. Bowling, pastor of the First Baptist church of Norfolk, Va. "It seems to my mind," he said, "that a devilish propaganda of evil has been set on foot by our American foes for the perpetuation of crime and ignorance among the members of our race, and that the low and vile and vicious and truckling among us, are striving with might and main to assist in this pernicious evil.

2,000 AT LODGE PICNIC.

Cause of the Insurgents Indorsed at Big Meeting at St. James.

St. James.—The Modern Woodmen of Watonwan county held a picnic here which was attended by over two thousand.

A. N. Nelson, consul of the St. James camp, was chairman of the committee on arrangements, and after a concert by the band in the City park, called a mass meeting of Woodmen and Royal Neighbors.

H. W. Haislet, of Butterfield, was introduced as chairman of the meeting, and addresses were delivered by J. L. Sundean, of Minneapolis, Senator Haycraft, of Madelia, and F. F. Ellsworth, of Mankato.

A committee was appointed to draft resolutions expressing the unanimous sentiment of the Woodmen and Royal Neighbors of this county in favor of the insurgent program. There was a balloon ascension and a ball game and other sports, and the evening was given over to dancing.

The balloon ascension by Thompson, of Minneapolis, was a success, as there was no wind to interfere and he came down within two blocks of the starting point. The baseball game between the St. James and Worthington teams resulted in a victory for the home team by 4 to 3.

NO RIVER IMPROVEMENT.

Wilkinson Says System Stands Where It Did Half Century Ago.

Winona.—"In no branch of commercial activity in this country has there been so great a lack of development and progress as in river transportation and terminals. The whole system stands today where it stood fifty years ago. The old-fashioned methods do not in any way meet modern requirements. They are archaic and out of date."

This was the keynote statement of Thomas Wilkinson of Burlington, Ia., president of the Upper Mississippi River Improvement association, in an address before the commercial bodies in this city. He recently attended a waterways meeting in Taylor's Falls, and is spreading the gospel of improved terminals and harbors in the different Mississippi cities.

He predicted a great revival of the river traffic as soon as the Panama canal is completed, but said that unless cities and towns establish docks and induce river trade, railway lines and high rates will continue.

Boy Robs Own Home.

Minneapolis. — Making comparison of the handwriting in a letter written to a fictitious burglar by Louis Richter, the 15-year-old son of Dan E. Richter, enabled Detective Crummy to find the burglar and restore to the Richter family its silverware and a watch stolen Wednesday and Thursday. Crummy induced the boy to write a letter to the burglar, who had left three different notes in the flat after the thefts.

Woman Captures Fugitive.

Winona. — A large posse of enraged villagers quickly organized when an Italian waylaid and brutally assaulted a co-worker in the outskirts of Trempealeau village and fled. PREDICT BIG CROP

B. W. SNOW OF FARM JOURNAL LOOKS FOR 260,000,000 BUSHEL HARVEST.

RETURNS ALL AROUND

Declares Almost the Entire Area Planted Will Show Good Yield—Weather Conditions Termed Ideal for Wheat.

Minneapolis.—Crop records are likely to be broken in the Northwest this season if present prospects are maintained. The experts who have been looking over the grain fields say this section of the country never had such a big promise.

B. W. Snow, of the Orange Judd Farmer says:

"Minnesota and the two Dakotas can easily exceed 260,000,000 bushels of spring wheat. Aside from a small district in western South Dakota and a still more limited area in west central North Dakota the three states have a perfect prospect.

"The soil has all the moisture needed to mature the crop and the cool weather is just right for heavy filling. The growth is fully up to normal, except in the extreme north, where it is now heading and is only a few days late.

"The probability of serious black rust damage is remote, because the crop will mature too early for it, and fields show less red and orange leaf rust than usual.

"Oats and barley are equally good. It looks like the greatest crop year in the history of the Northwest."

Oscar Lyle, another crop expert was on 'change yesterday, just back from a trip over the Northwest. He said that the three states would have 200,000,000 bushels of wheat sure, and at the present time the crop would measure up to 240,000,000 bushels easily.

The first report of oats being harvested was received from Conde, S. D. The crop is above the average.

The Northwest "weather menu" has not been more propitious in years than it is now according to grain men. They say the cool temperature was just what the wheat fields needed as a safeguard against the black rust.

Practically every weather change has come at the psychological moment, say the grain men. Unless unusual elemental developments such as hail or heavy windstorms arise it is expected that a crop as big or bigger than the one of 1909 will be harvested.

CALL FOR "THIRD PARTY"

Invites Attendance of All Without Regard to Party.

Minneapolis. — A call has just been issued for the "third party" state convention to be held in St. Paul, July 30. It invites attendance of all "electors of the state of Minnesota, without regard to past party affiliations, who believe that the renomination of President Taft in the recent Chicago convention was secured by unjust, fraudulent and dishonorable methods, and should be repudiated at the polls, and all Progressives who desire to participate in the selection of a candidate for president of the United States by the national Progressive party, to be voted for at the coming November elections."

The convention will be held in the St. Paul Auditorium. Every one present will be considered a delegate from his county.

BAD STORM IN STEELE CO.

Crops In Southern Section Damaged by Cloudburst and High Wind.

Owatonna.—Owatonna was visited by one of the most severe rain and electrical storms in years. Lightning struck the large barn of C. Markson and destroyed it, killing one horse and permanently injuring another. The barn of L. Larson was also destroyed by fire from lightning. A party of autoists returning from a baseball game at Austin, including about twenty cars, was caught in the storm, which was a veritable cloudburst accompanied by heavy wind. Many trees were destroyed near the city.

Physicians Say Mrs. Phipps Will Be Invalid If She Survives Wound.

Minneapolis. — The physicians at the St. Barnabas hospital said that Mrs. Helen Phipps, shot by her husband in their home in Wayzata last Monday would be paralyzed if she survived her injuries. Mrs. Phipps is paralyzed now from her waist down and has but little use of her upper limbs. Attendants of the hospital said physicians did not think she would survive.

MADE BIG PROFIT FOR STATE

Purely Business Argument for the Establishment of Sanitoriums for the Tuberculosis.

According to figures contained in the annual report of Dr. H. L. Bnruee, superintendent of the Rhode Island state sanitorium, the earnings of the ex-patients of that institution during the year 1911 would amount to over $266,000. This is a sum three times as large as that spent each year for maintenance of the institution, including four per cent. interest and depreciation charges.

The actual earnings in 1911 of 170 ex-patients were obtained by Dr. Barnes. These ranged from $2 to $31 per week, the total earnings for the year amounting to $102,752. On this basis, Dr. Barnes computes the figures above given. He says, however: "While institutions for the cure of tuberculosis are good investments, there is good reason for thinking that institutions for the isolation of far-advanced cases would be still better investments."

Voice of Conscience.

A western Kentucky negro was in jail awaiting trial for stealing a calf. His wife called to see him. On her way out the jailer, whose name was Grady, halted her.

"Mandy," he inquired, "have you got a lawyer for Jim?"

"No, sah," said his wife. "Ef Jim was guilty I'd git him a lawyer right away; but he tells me he ain't guilty, and so, of co'se, I ain't aimin' to hire none."

"Mr. Grady," came a voice from the cells above, "you tell dat nigger woman down thar to git a lawyer—and git a dam' good one, too!"—Saturday Evening Post.

Out of a total of 46,450 hospital days' treatment given, 39,147, or 84 per cent., were free, the treatment costing the state on an average $200 per patient. Out of the 188 free cases investigated, 56 had no families and no income on admission to the sanitorium. Out of 132 patients having homes, the number in the family averaged 5.2, and the average family earnings were 5.46. In 59 cases the families had no income, and in only five cases were there any savings, none of which amounted to as much as $100.

Everything goes wrong if the breakfast lies in your stomach like a mud pie. What you eat does harm if you can't digest it—it turns to poison.

A bright lady teacher found this to be true, even of an ordinary light breakfast of eggs and toast. She says:

"Two years ago I contracted a very annoying form of indigestion. My stomach was in such condition that a simple breakfast of fruit, toast and egg gave me great distress.

"I was slow to believe that trouble could come from such a simple diet, but finally had to give it up, and found a great change upon a cup of hot Postum and Grape-Nuts with cream, for my morning meal. For more than a year I have held to this course and have not suffered except when injudiciously varying my diet.

"I have been a teacher for several years and find that my easily digested breakfast means a saving of nervous force for the entire day. My gain of ten pounds in weight also causes me to want to testify to the value of Grape-Nuts.

"Grape-Nuts holds first rank at our table."

THE SUNBEAM.

BY W. G. HUNT.

Published every Friday, at Sunbeam, Pennington County, Minnesota.

Entered as Second-class matter August 2[illegible] [illegible]905, at the post office at Sunbeam Minn. under the Act of Congress of March 3, 1879.

There are some political announcements that are left out of this issue which will appear next week. J. M. Bishop has filed for the republican nomination for county attorney and E. M. Stanton for the democratic nomination.

With the good prospects of fair crops and prices our farmers are not doing a great deal of worring about politics this year. But we have heard a number of them express the opinion that democratic free trade was preferable to Taft's Reciprocity, which only protects the manufacturers and opens the free trade doors to Canada's products.

Clusters and Long Lines Formed by Storms and Ocean Currents.

Among the perils and wonders of the ocean there are few more interesting things than icebergs, interesting not only by reason of their gigantic size, their fantastic shapes, their exceeding beauty, but also for the manner wherein they array themselves.

Icebergs exhibit a tendency to form both clusters and long lines, and these groupings may arise from the effects both of ocean currents and of storms.

Some very singular lines of bergs, extending for many hundreds of miles east of Newfoundland, have been shown on official charts issued by the government. Two of these cross each other, each keeping on its independent course after the crossing. In several instances parallel lines of bergs leave long spaces of clear water between them.

Curiously enough, while enormous fields of ice invade the so called "steamship lanes" of the Atlantic at the opening of spring during certain years, in other years at that season there is comparatively little ice to be seen. The ice comes, of course, from the edges of the arctic regions, from the icebound coasts of Greenland and Labrador, where huge bergs, broken from the front of the glaciers at the point where they reach the sea, start on their long journeys toward the south, driven by the great current that flows from Baffin bay into the northern Atlantic ocean.—Harper's Weekly.

Why Stars Twinkle.

The twinkling of the stars is chiefly an effect produced in the atmosphere upon the waves of light. It is due to currents and strata of air of different densities intermingling and floating past each other, through which the light passes to the eye. It is seen much more in cold than in warm weather and nearer the horizon more than overhead. The same effect may be seen by looking out of a window over a hot radiator or a candle held on the other side of a hot stove, so that you have to look through a body of highly heated air at the candle flame. The flame will be seen to waver and quiver. In other words, the various layers of air are of different densities and in motion, hence the "twinkle."—Exchange.

The Grass Widow Defined.

It is related of a Methodist bishop that when presiding over a district conference in North Carolina he had an attack of hay fever and in consequence was somewhat irascible and impatient. A young preacher who gave a rather poor account of his work was given a severe reprimand by the bishop and asked to state the reason for his failure.

"Well, bishop," he explained, "we had a lot of trouble the first year with a grass widow, and"—

"A grass widow!" roared the bishop. "And what, pray, is a grass widow?"

"A grass widow, bishop," responded the young clergyman, "is a woman whose husband died of hay fever."—St. Louis Republic.

Perhaps.

"Why," said the young man who tries to be cynical, "are dogs and horses so much more faithful in their friendships for us than our fellow human beings?"

"Perhaps," replied Miss Cayenne, "it's often due to the fact that we treat them with so much more kindness and consideration."—Washington Star.

A Good Third.

"You admit that you are not first in her affections, yet you seem cheerful."

"Oh, I can't expect to compete with the pug dog and the rubber plant."—Washington Herald.

POLITICAL ANNOUNCEMENT.

I am a candidate for the office of Register of Deeds of Pennington county, and solicit the support of the voters at the Republican primaries to be held September 17th 1912. Nels J. Anderson

FOR CLERK OF COURT.

I wish to announce to the voters of Pennington County that I will be a candidate for the Republican nomination for Clerk of the District Court for Pennington County, subject to the decision of the voters at the Republican Primary, September 17th, 1912.

We have occupied the position since the organization of Pennington County and have tried to the best of my ability to be strictly impartial and as efficient as my ability would allow. I will be pleased to have the votes and support of all citizens who believe that I have filled the position in an honest and efficient manner.

If nominated and elected I here by promise to give the office my personal attention and my best efforts to honestly administer the affairs of the office in a strictly impartial and efficient manner.

Harry E. Ives,
Thief River Falls

COUNTY AUDITOR.

I wish hereby to announce to the Voters of Pennington County, that I am a candidate for the Republican Nomination for the Office of County Auditor, at the September 17th, 1912 Primaries; Since my appointment to this office, at the time of the organization of Pennington County. I have given the office my whole time and my very best efforts. Should I be favored with the nomination and election, I believe with the experience gained, I will be still better prepared to serve you the coming term.

Very truly yours,
A. H. Fasel

REGISTER OF DEEDS

I wish to announce to the voters of Pennington County that I am a candidate for the office of Register of Deeds of Pennington County and respectfully solicit your votes and support.

Geo. W. Elder.

Having received the nomination of the Public Ownership Party for candidate for County Commissioner of the 5th commissioner district, I will, if elected, consider myself at the service of the people and use all my efforts in the interests of the tax payers of Pennington County.

I earnestly solicit the support of the voters at the final election November 5th.

Respectfully
George Lemiers.

FOR COUNTY TREASUR.

I wish to announce that I am a candidate for County Treasurer, subject to the ratification of the Republican voters at the primaries, September 17, 1912 Being that political parties have always regarded it as important to have their members elected to all offices, it must be for aid in promoting party politics, for so far as the work in the county offices is concerned, it can make no difference whatever, what the officer's political affiliations are, so the idea must be that he is expected to to maintain the average of prices. While the price level does not prove that times are good, theoretically, yet we know that with the enormous debt of the country, it will be harder to pay it with low prices than with high, steady prices. I believe that because one cannot support the whole Republicans [illegible] to quite supporting candidates for congress and the legislature, which is by far more important than the office of president, so far as party politics is concerned. These are my ideas, and I shall use my influence to help along on those lines, no matter whether I am nominated or not.

Sincerely for the success of the party.

Andrew Trovatten

JUSTICE OF THE PEACE.

Special attention given to Probate Court work.

THE LOCAL NEWS.

Call and see us, when you are ready to make your final proof.

Miss Myrtle Fuller from Long Prairie Minnesota, arrived here Thursday for an extended visit with her sister Mrs. Walter McAndress.

Remember the County Fair.

The hay crop is very light this year and it takes a lot of travelling to get a ton of hay.

C. L. Clark is on a business trip to Thief River Falls today.

Singer Bros. were transacting business at Thief River Falls on Monday.

Harvest of wheat and oats will begin next week. The grain is nicely filled and there is no sign of rust up to the present time.

We have made arrangements to put in some additional help next week so we will be enabled to set more type.

Andrew Kolestrand was down to Grand Forks this week to consult a Dr. about his health, which has been very poor this spring, but he is now on the way to recovery.

A teacher with a first grade certificate wanted to teach an eight months term of school in Highlanding district. Apply to T. S. Jacobson, Highlanding Minn.

Representative Henry of Texas says that there aint any republicans left it Texas. If he means the Taft kind he might have said, or in Minnesota either.

Walter McAndress has as fine a five acre field of corn as ever was grown in any country, which we hope to see demonstrate the fact that corn can be successfully raised in Pennington county.

We seen some extra fine fields of wheat on our way to Thief River Falls this week. The western part of the town of Kratka and Smiley had some small showers of rain in June that did not get this far east that helped matters out wonderfully for their crops.

We will call a meeting of the tax payers on ditch 47 before the expiration of the bonding company so all those who desire to do so can join in the action for damage. As for ourselves we are assessed pretty heavy on that ditch and don't propose to be deprived of the use of it and be made a monkey of much longer, if there is a remedy in court, and we think there is.

Wm. G. Hunt was down to the County seat Monday making final proof on his homestead, which accounts for the lack of editorial matter in THE SUNBEAM this week. The copy was written, but was mislaid by the compositor, something that will not happen in this office again as long as the name of the present management is at the head of the column.

There was a light attendance at the school meeting on Saturday evening, which shows a disposition to let the other fellows take the responsibility of running the business. T. S. Jacobson was reelected chairman of the board, Walter McAndress as treasurer and W. G. Hunt as clerk holding over. A little addition was made to the usual sum voted as the district run a little behind last year. It was also voted to have eight months school with a first grade teacher.

The river is full of logs on their way to the mills, to add to the wealth production of northern Minnesota. When the lumber companies are fair and allow Red Lake River to run its natural flow of water we like to see them get their logs down, but when they shut off the water and deprive other people of the use of it, and have men of the ilk of Major Skunk and our present Game and Fish Commission [illegible] this State certify that they "never" touched it, there is likely to be a row on tap.

A RED HOT LAWSUIT.

The case of Stephen Singer vs Joseph DuChamp, in which a verdict was rendered for the defendant in municipal court, at Thief River Falls last week has been appealed to District court. This was a case that arose over the settlement of accounts with Pearl Maby for attorney on one side and G. Halverson on the other, and when they meet in Thief River Falls, the attorneys can say: "Come take a cigar, we have struck two birds of a feather, you pick one and i'll pick tother".

Another Bluff On 47.

For the benefit of those who are interested in ditch 47 we wish to say, that after the contractors had utterly failed to complete the contract after being given one years extension of time, that the bonding Company was given a reasonable time, this entire season until October 1st, to complete the ditch. There is not now any prospect that they will do it, and they need not think they will hoodwink anyone by trying to resurrect the settling dredge ghost and get a few puffs out of it and try to construe it as an attempt to dig ditch 47, for they know and we know that is an impossibility, for there is eleven feet cuts in that ditch and that old machine never could dig more than eight feet. But they are now at the end of their rope for extensions, and we have engaged attorneys to start action for damages the next day after the bondsmans time is out.

[illegible] THE ART STUDENT.

He [illegible] at First the Comments of [illegible] Unknown Critic.

An art student was copying one of Abbott H. Thayer's paintings at the Metropolitan Museum of Art in New York one day when a plainly dressed man who looked as if he might be a mechanic approached and, posting himself at the young man's elbow, watched him as he labored over his subject.

"You've got the angle of the mouth wrong, and the left eye is too oblique," remarked the man decidedly.

The student blinked angrily, and the hand that wielded the brush trembled slightly, but he took no notice of the unsolicited criticism.

"There is too much yellow in your flesh tint," continued the man.

Still no reply from the student, who ostentatiously slapped on more yellow in the high light on the nose.

"Did you hear what I said?" questioned the man.

"Yes, I did," responded the student wrathfully, turning and glaring at his modest looking critic. "What do you know about it, anyway?"

"I ought to know something about it," was the smiling response. "It was I who painted the picture."—New York Press.

Boots and Spurs.

A contemporary manuscript account of the diet of Ratisbon, held in 1630 by the Emperor Ferdinand II. on the occasion of the landing of Gustavus Adolphus of Sweden in Germany, mentions as a remarkable fact that the Hungarian cavalry who rode through the streets to the ceremonial wore their spurs on their boot soles. It is difficult to credit that these spurs were fixed on the flat of the boot, for thus shod the horsemen could neither walk nor stand, especially when the large size of the spurs worn at the period is considered. Probably the writer intended to indicate that instead of being fastened to the heel in the usual fashion they were made to project from the fore part of the military boot, which is a portion of the sole. The same manuscript adds that the Hungarian horses had their manes, tails and feet painted red.

Letters of Marque.

Letters of marque and reprisal, as they were called, were first issued in the time of Edward I. to give leave to retaliate beyond the marches or limits of a country for wrongs suffered at the hands of a power nominally at peace. In this first instance they were aimed at Portugal. About 100 years later two Hanse towns in Mecklenburg, wishing to relieve their prince, who was beleaguered in Stockholm, issued letters of marque—thieves' letters, as the sufferers called them—to all the rascals of the Baltic authorizing them to victual the besieged city. This done, they turned themselves into a confederacy of sea robbers known as Victualing brothers, or St. Vitalius' brothers, and rendered the Scandinavian seas unsafe for half a century.

Such a statement, coming from the cashier of a bank, shows what confidence responsible people have in these pills. Mr. A. L. Wilson after trying them wrote:

"I have used Dr. Miles' Nerve and Liver Pills and also your Anti-Pain Pills, on myself, with good results. LOST TREASURES UNDER THE ENGLISH FLAG

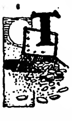
Gold and Jewels still waiting to be found by some Modern Adventurer

by Buffington Phillips

COPYRIGHT BY THE RIDGWAY CO.



TREASURES where the cows find them; treasures which the divers can see, but cannot reach; treasures where only superstitious fears stand in the way of recovery—such is the state of affairs in and about Great Britain proper, one of the richest fields in the world for the treasure-hunting adventurers.

The most ardent seeker of these troves was King John. Most of his time was spent in hunting buried treasures of other centuries, assembling the gold and jewels of England and burying them again. Only those groups of known value and of certain or nearly certain location can be mentioned in this article, so numerous are they.

It was known that the King had knowledge, gleaned from old documents, that the Romans, during the time of their occupation, had great quantities of gold, silver, jewels and plate in a fashionable resort in the north of England, and, being cut off in the rear by an invasion of Picts and Scots, buried it in a vast trove near the old Roman wall in Northumberland.

King John made extensive explorations and found a large cache made at a later period, but did not find the more important store of wealth. He removed his find to Hermitage Castle, and, according to all accounts, the masonry of the wall was opened from the outside and the treasure hidden once again.

Once since his day the true clue to the Roman cache was found and lost again through the brutality and stupidity of some English county officials in Northumberland.

Two poor and ignorant farm laborers were working in a field on the line of the old Roman ruin one day and sat down, in the shade of a heap of stones, for their lunch. Idly, they turned over a large stone, and in the bottom of the cavity left they saw an enormously heavy chain.

Pushing away the dirt until they could get hold of it, they drew it out. It was several feet in length and weighed enough to make a burden for both of them. Seemingly it was brass, and they left it till the next day, when they were working with a cart. At evening they loaded it in the cart and carried it home, leaving it against the wall of the stable as a curious but useless find.

One Sunday when idling with some neighbors they fell to discussing the chain, and one of the neighbors scraped it with a knife. He said it looked and felt more like gold than brass and was very soft. Taking a broken link to the market when he next went, the elder of the two finders submitted it to a jeweler, who pronounced it solid gold of a very fine quality.

The neighbor who had made the discovery of the nature of the find thought he should have half and be let in on the secret of the remainder. This was refused, so he informed the authorities, and the two peasants were arrested, spent a long period in jail, and, as a result of the ill treatment, one of them went insane.

The older had steadfastly refused to disclose the spot where the chain was found, having taken an oath when he was flogged in prison that he would never tell any one. This was his method of getting even and it proved very effective.

It is curious indeed that the termination of the great treasure hunter and hider's career should be marked by the interment of wealth in an amount as great, or greater, than that involved in any of his previous exploits.

In his historic flight, King John's party carried with it not only an enormous treasure in the store of gold that represented the royal funds, but a cumbersome weight of treasures he had acquired, and more valuable today than all the others—the full regalia, crown jewels, and insignia of the great orders of which the King was head.

The British Museum and the various orders would pay at least $25,000,000 for the recovery of these, and yet it does not seem a difficult matter. Some individual or syndicate with the proper backing could easily look up the circumstances as contained in the old records and make a consistent, determined effort.

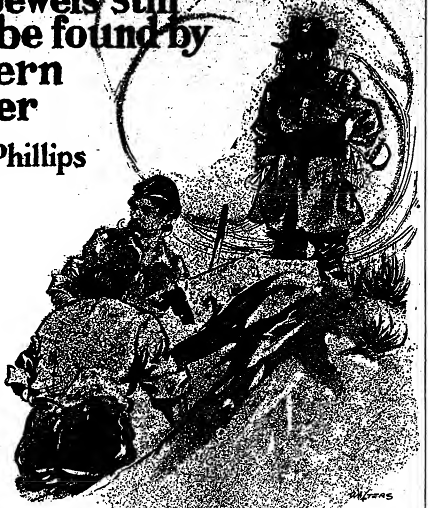
The royal fugitive and retinue were riding in haste around the dip of the Wash, and the animals on which the precious load was carried mired so frequently in the lowlands that it was decided to cache the treasure.

The King and a few faithful noblemen superintended the work, impressing some peasants for the labor. The records state distinctly that the interment took place precisely where the road crosses the river to Lynn.

The old road ran where there is now a morass in spring and fall, baked dry in summer. A few years ago, during the drought season, some farmers, sinking a well so as to water the cattle that were feeding on the marsh grass, struck an odd crown of solid gold, but made no further excavation.

By the time London heard of the find, the season had changed and the spot was a swamp once more. There is no question in my mind, after reading all accounts, that the treasure is there and can be excavated with a steam shovel floated on a barge into the mouth of the great Ouse.

In 1799, when England was at war with the Netherlands, H. M. S. Lutine sailed from Yarmouth [illegible]. She sank off the [illegible] Vlieland [illegible] carried gold and silver specie. It was later learned that she was insured for $5,941,665.



The United Kingdom was literally girdled with sunken treasure in the latter part of the sixteenth century. Sir Francis Drake returned in 1580 from his great journey of exploration to California, and he had an adequate idea of the vast amount of gold which was being carried in Spanish ships from Mexico and South America to Spain. As a matter of fact, there was so much of it in Spain that the possessors did not know what to do with it, and the idea of the great Armada may have been conceived as much to find a glorious means of expending the royal wealth and the wealth of the ambitious nobles as to have a method of diverting the attention of the poorer classes, who were very little better off in spite of the flood of gold that had come to the Peninsula.

However that may be, the great Armada is usually considered a magnificent adventure which was meant to crush the power of England at sea and to humble the kingdom to a state of practical vassalage to Spain, her bitter enemy.

The English ships were well-trimmed, meagerly fitted vessels for war—war and nothing else. The Spanish ships had, in some cases, silken sails, many splendid canopies on poop decks, gold-mounted cannon, and even the lowest estimated accounts say that from seventy to one hundred millions in Spanish gold and silver was the sum total in treasures distributed among eighty great ships.

How Sir Francis Drake and the British admirals and captains fell on the fleet and scattered it, how in battle after battle it was worsted, is a matter of history familiar to every one. The bulk of the Armada, driven by a great storm, was hurried into the North Sea and, vainly endeavoring to circle by the Orkneys and the Shetlands and get back to the Bay of Biscay through the Minches, the North Channel, Irish Sea, and St. George's Channel, was wrecked in strange waters.

It is impossible in brief space to go into detail concerning all of these rich sunken wrecks. Each of them that is known has its more or less definite history and from some of them millions of dollars' worth of trappings and treasure were recovered in the years following soon after the gigantic disaster.

One of the Spanish Armada ships, the Florencia, went ashore in the Sound of Mull in 1588. She had a vast treasure aboard, and when she was attacked by a band of Scots her commander blew her up. The Duke of Argyll spent a fortune in the search. His ancestors have been hunting since 1664, and in 1667 an announcement was made public that the old records showed that there was $30,000,000 in money on her, besides the gold and silver plate. None of it has ever been recovered, although the Argyll family have the full information of where the wreck lies.

The Cavalier treasure of Marston Moor is another famous cache. For centuries the villagers near the historic field where the Roundheads and Cavaliers contended have been thrown into great excitement by finds of gold-pieces and by the arrival of parties of strangers who the villagers imagine have come to look for the treasure.

The story of this trove is that before the battle, owing to the necessity of shifting headquarters of the King's government so often, the army's funds in four chests, each of which could be transported en pannier between two large horses, was brought to the Cavalier camp. A sudden descent of the Roundhead cavalry cut off the treasure and its guardian, who held out stubbornly till dark, then buried the treasure hastily.

The Cavaliers retreated, expecting to receive reinforcements and regain possession of [illegible] the battle of Marston Moor [illegible] ground was torn up [illegible] quite undisturbed—a village cow found it, but she did not appreciate her advantages and could not have told her master if she had.

It is a well-known fact that when certain forms of stomach trouble affect cows, dogs and other animals, they seek metal oxides, and will swallow nails, rusty iron, and bits of jewelry. This particular cow was so troubled. Her grazing-ground included part of the general locality in which the treasure is known to lie. She was noticed licking the rusty hinges of the pasture gates, licking an old plowshare, and some weeks later she gave evidences of being in great pain. The wiseacres of the village were called in council and decided that she had swallowed something that disagreed with her, and, partly out of curiosity and partly through desire to save the beef by killing her before she died, the owner had an end put to her misery and an autopsy was held. Imagine the excitement when the butchers opened the stomach and, amid nails, bits of iron, and copper, found a number of gold-pieces of the Cavalier treasure and a small latch-lock of the type of which there must have been several on every one of the treasure chests. The soil had been washed or had been plowed over the treasure, and the cow had found it and absorbed her mortal end. The wiseacres then told the owner that if he had but kept the cow alive till she returned to the spot where she had found the treasure he might have watched her and soon discovered it. He worried over his folly till he grew so despondent that he hanged himself.

The square face of Gibraltar, made so familiar in America by use in advertising, in reality fronts the landward side. Between the Rock and the mainland runs a flat sandy strip that is neither British nor Spanish. Gibraltar has always been a great haunt of smugglers, and the neutral strip has always been their greatest danger-ground.

In 1870 the dangerous Theron band desisted from smuggling long enough to run some cargoes of arms into Spain for the use of Don Carlos and his army. After securing some $450,000 they set out to effect a retirement from Gibraltar, and made their way to Jaen, where a wealthy merchant was known to have some $600,000, collected in readiness for use in the Carlist cause. Under pretext that they had instructions to deliver a shipload of munitions to him at Malaga, and displaying the documentary evidences of their late deal with Don Carlos, they persuaded the merchant to accompany them on the road to Malaga.

When a fitting opportunity came they murdered him, threw his body into a dry ravine, and with their weight of wealth in gold and English notes, set out for Gibraltar. The body was found sooner than they had expected, and they were pursued. Some ten miles from the neutral ground they were overtaken, and a running fight occurred, in which Gasprey, one of the outlaws, was killed in a most spectacular manner.

Four of the outlaws crouched among the rocks and held the pursuers at bay, anxiously awaiting Theron's return. But when the dawn came they found that he had buried the treasure, turned the mules loose, and was making his way back to them when a bullet had stretched him out dead on the sand.

Seeing this, the four now tried to retreat toward the Rock, one after the other, but they were shot down.

When it was found that there had been over a million dollars in booty with the party, a careful search was begun, but the drifting sand had obliterated the necessary traces and it has never been recovered.

ECZEMA CAME ON SCALP

Lebanon, O.—"My eczema started on my thigh with a small pimple. It also came on my scalp. It began to itch and I began to scratch. For eighteen or twenty years I could not tell what I passed through with that awful itching. I would scratch until the blood would soak through my underwear, and I couldn't talk to my friends on the street but I would be digging and punching that spot, until I was very much ashamed. The itching was so intense I could not sleep after once in bed and warm. I certainly suffered torment with that eczema for many years.

"I chased after everything I ever heard of, but all to no avail. I saw the advertisement for Cuticura Soap and Ointment and sent for a sample. Imagine my delight when I applied the first dose to that awful itching fire on my leg and scalp, in less than a minute the itching on both places ceased. I got some more Cuticura Soap and Ointment. After the second day I never had another itching spell, and Cuticura Soap and Ointment completely cured me. I was troubled with awful dandruff all over my scalp. The Cuticura Soap has cured that trouble." (Signed) L. R. Fink, Jan. 22, 1912.

The Middle-Aged Women.

Of the many ways in which the middle-aged woman may vary the effect of her afternoon gowns none is simpler than the use of a collar and cuffs of white voile edged with scalloping and embroidery in a floral design. Another change may be the frock set of white chiffon with border of black malines, and still another is the one of black net hemstitched with silver thread. Some of these collars are so long in front that they terminate only at the waist line, where they cross in surplice effect and are tucked away under the girdle. An excellent model of this sort is of light blue lawn embroidered with black dots, and a second is of white agaric trimmed with tiny folds of broadcloth, alternating with eponge.

Excellent Plan.

"He's perfectly fine," said Mrs. Van Tyle. SYNOPSIS.

Lieut. Harry Mallory is ordered to the Philippines. He and Marjorie Newton decide to elope, but wreck of taxicab prevents their seeing minister on the way to the train. Transcontinental train is taking on passengers. Porter has a lively time with an Englishman and Ira Lathrop, a Yankee business man. The elopers have an exciting time getting to the train. "Little Jimmie" Wellington, bound for Reno to get a divorce, boards train in maudlin condition. Later Mrs. Jimmie appears. She is also bound for Reno with same object. Likewise Mrs. Sammy Whitcomb. Latter blames Mrs. Jimmie for her marital troubles. Classmates of Mallory decorate bridal berth. Rev. and Mrs. Temple start on a vacation. They decide to cut loose and Temple removes evidence of his calling.

CHAPTER VIII.

A Mixed Pickle.

Mrs. Whitcomb had almost blushed when she had murmured to Lieutenant Hudson:

"I should think the young couple would have preferred a stateroom."

And Mr. Hudson had flinched a little as he explained:

"Yes, of course. We tried to get it, but it was gone."

It was during the excitement over the decoration of the bridal section, that the stateroom-tenants slipped in unobserved.

First came a fluttering woman whose youthful beauty had a certain tone of experience, saddening and wisening. The porter brought her in from the station-platform, led her to the stateroom's concave door and passed in with her luggage. But she lingered without, a Peri at the gate of Paradise. When the porter returned to bow her in, she shivered and hesitated, and then demanded:

"Oh, porter, are you sure there's nobody else in there?"

The porter chuckled, but humored her panic.

"I ain't seen nobody. Shall I look under the seat?"

To his dismay, she nodded her head violently. He rolled his eyes in wonderment, but returned to the stateroom, made a pretense of examination, and came back with a face full of reassurance. "No'm, they's nobody there. Take a mighty small-size burglar to squeeze unda that bald—er—berth. No'm, nobody there."

"Oh!"

The gasp was so equivocal that he made bold to ask:

"Is you pleased or disappointed?"

The mysterious young woman was too much agitated to rebuke the impudence. She merely sighed: "Oh, porter, I'm so anxious."

"I'm not—now," he muttered, for she handed him a coin.

"Porter, have you seen anybody on board that looks suspicious?"

"Evvabody looks suspicious to me, Missy. But what was you expecting—especial?"

"Oh, porter, have you seen anybody that looks like a detective in disguise?"

"Well, they's one man looks 's if he was disguised as a balloon, but I don't believe he's no slooch-hound."

"Well, if you see anybody that looks like a detective and he asks for Mrs. Fosdick—"

"Mrs. What-dick?"

"Mrs. Fosdick! You tell him I'm not on board." And she gave him another coin.

"Yassum," said the porter, lingering willingly on such fertile soil. "I'll tell him Mrs. Fosdick done give me her word she wasn't on bode."

"Yes!—and if a woman should ask you."

"What kind of a woman?"

"The hideous kind that men call handsome."

"Oh, ain't they hideous, them handsome women?"

"Well, if such a woman asks for Mrs. Fosdick—she's my husband's first wife—but of course that doesn't interest you."

"No'm—yes'm."

"If she comes—tell her—tell her—oh, what shall we tell her?"

The porter rubbed his thick skull: "Lemme see—we might say you—I tell you what we'll tell her: we'll tell her you took the train for New York; and if she runs mighty fast she can just about ketch it."

"Fine, fine!" And she rewarded his genius with another coin. "And, porter." He had not budged. "Porter, if a very handsome man with luscious eyes and a soulful smile asks for me—"

"I'll th'ow him off the train!"

"Oh, no—no!—that's my husband—my present husband. You may let him in. Now is it all perfectly clear, porter?"

"Oh, yassum, clear as clear." Thus guaranteed she entered the stateroom, leaving the porter alone with his problem. He tried to work it out, but a [illegible]

"If your present husband's absent wife gits on bode disguised as a handsome hideous woman I'm to th'ow him—her—off the train and let her—him—come in—oh, yassum, you may rely on me." He bowed and held out his hand. But she was gone. He shuffled on into the car.

He had hardly left the little space before the stateroom when a handsome man with luscious eyes, but without any smile at all, came slinking along the corridor and tapped cautiously on the door. Silence alone answered him at first, then when he had rapped again, he heard a muffled:

"Go away. I'm not in."

He put his lips close and softly called: "Edith!"

At this Sesame the door opened a trifle, but when he tried to enter, a hand thrust him back and a voice again warned him off. "You mustn't come in."

"But I'm your husband."

"That's just why you mustn't come in." The door opened a little wider to give him a view of a down-cast beauty moaning:

"Oh, Arthur, I'm so afraid."

"Afraid?" he sniffed. "With your husband here?"

"That's the trouble, Arthur. What if your former wife should find us together?"

"But she and I are divorced."

"In some states, yes—but other states don't acknowledge the divorce. That former wife of yours is a fiend to pursue us this way."

"She's no worse than your former husband. He's pursuing us, too. My divorce was as good as yours, my dear."

"Yes, and no better."

The angels looking on might have judged from the ready tempers of the newly married and not entirely unmarried twain that their new alliance promised to be as exciting as their previous estates. Perhaps the man subtly felt the presence of those eternal eavesdroppers, for he tried to end the love-duel in the corridor with an appeasing caress and a tender appeal: "But let's not start our honeymoon with a quarrel."

His partial wife returned the caress and tried to explain: "I'm not quarreling with you, dear heart, but with the horrid divorce laws. Why, oh, why did we ever interfere with them?"

He made a brave effort with: "We ended two unhappy marriages, Edith, to make one happy one."

"But I'm so unhappy, Arthur, and so afraid."

He seemed a trifle afraid himself and his gaze was askance as he urged: "But the train will start soon, Edith—and then we shall be safe."

Mrs. Fosdick had a genius for inventing unpleasant possibilities. "But what if your former wife or my former husband should have a detective on board?"

"A detective?—poof!" He snapped his fingers in bravado. "You are with your husband, aren't you?"

"In Illinois, yes," she admitted, very dolefully. "But when we come to Iowa, I'm a bigamist, and when we come to Nebraska, you're a bigamist, and when we come to Wyoming, we're not married at all."

It was certainly a tangled web they had woven, but a ray of light shot through it into his bewildered soul. "But we're all right in Utah. Come, dearest."

He took her by the elbow to escort her into their sanctuary, but still she hung back.

"On one condition, Arthur—that you leave me as soon as we cross the Iowa state line, and not come back till we get to Utah. Remember, the Iowa state line!"

"Oh, all right," he smiled. And seeing the porter, beckoned him close and asked with careless indifference: "Oh, porter, what time do we reach the Iowa state line?"

"Two fifty-five in the mawning, sah."

"Two fifty-five a. m.?" the wretch exclaimed.

"Two fifty-five a. m., yassah," the porter repeated, and wondered why this excerpt from the time-table should exert such a dramatic effect on the luscious-eyed Fosdick.

He had small time to meditate the puzzle, for the train was about to be launched upon its long voyage. He went out to the platform, and watched a couple making that way. As their only luggage was a dog-basket he supposed that they were simply come to bid some of his passengers good-bye. No tips were to be expected from such transients, so he allowed them to help themselves up the steps.

Mallory and his Marjorie had tried to kiss the farewell or farewells half a dozen times, but she could not let him go at the gate. She asked the guard to let her through, and her beauty was bribe enough.

Again and again, she and Mallory paused. He wanted to take her back to the taxicab, but she would not be so dismissed. She must spend the last available second with him.

"I'll go as far as the steps of the car," she said. When they were arrived there, two porters, a sleeping car conductor and several smoking saunterers profaned the tryst. So she whispered that she would come aboard, for the corridor would be a quiet lane for the last rites.

And now that he had her actually on the train, Mallory's whole soul revolted against letting her go. The vision of her standing on the platform sad-eyed and torn, while the train swept him off into space was unendurable. He shut his eyes against it, but it glowed inside the lids.

And then temptation whispered him its old "Why not?" While it was working in his soul like a fermenting [illegible] our misfortune to an infernal taxicab's break-down."

Out of the anguish of her loneliness crept one little complaint:

"If you had really wanted me, you'd have had two taxicabs."

"Oh, how can you say that? I had the license bought and the minister waiting."

"He's waiting yet."

"And the ring—there's the ring." He fished it out of his waistcoat pocket and held it before her as a golden amulet.

"A lot of good it does now," said Marjorie. "You won't even wait over till the next train."

"I've told you a thousand times, my love," he protested, desperately, "if I don't catch the transport, I'll be court-martialed. If this train is late, I'm lost. If you really loved me you'd come along with me."

Her very eyes gasped at this astounding proposal.

"Why, Harry Mallory, you know it's impossible."

Like a sort of benevolent Satan, he laid the ground for his abduction: "You'll leave me, then, to spend three years without you—out among those Manila women."

She shook her head in terror at this vision. "It would be too horrible for words to have you marry one of those mahogany sirens."

He held out the apple. "Better come along, then."

"But how can I? We're not married."

He answered airily: "Oh, I'm sure there's a minister on board."

"But it would be too awful to be married with all the passengers gawking. No, I couldn't face it. Good-bye, honey."

She turned away, but he caught her arm: "Don't you love me?"

"To distraction. I'll wait for you, too."

"Three years is a long wait."

"But I'll wait, if you will."

With such devotion he could not tamper. It was too beautiful to risk or endanger or besmirch with any danger of scandal. He gave up his fantastic project and gathered her into his arms, crowded her into his very soul, as he vowed: "I'll wait for you forever and ever and ever."

Her arms swept around his neck, and she gave herself up as an exile from happiness, a prisoner of a far-off love:

"Good-bye, my husband-to-be."

"Good-bye my wife-that-was-to-have-been-and-will-be-maybe."

"Good-bye."

"Good-bye."

"Good-bye."

"Good-bye."

"I must go."

"Yes, you must."

"One last kiss."

"One more—one long last kiss."

And there, entwined in each other's arms, with lips wedded and eyelids clinched, they clung together, forgetting everything past, future or present. Love's anguish made them blind, mute and deaf.

They did not hear the conductor crying his "All Aboard!" down the long wall of the train. They did not hear the far-off knell of the bell. They did not hear the porters banging the vestibules shut. They did not feel the floor sliding out with them.

And so the porter found them, engulfed in one embrace, swaying and swaying, and no more aware of the increasing rush of the train than we other passengers on the earth-express are aware of its speed through the ether-routes on its ancient schedule.

The porter stood with his box-step in his hand, and blinked and wondered. And they did not even know they were observed.

Celebrated Armorers.

In olden times the armorer's work was not of a rough and ready description, but generally bore the signs of highly wrought workmanship. The various pieces of a suit fit into their positions to a nicety, there are no rough edges, and as a rule very little that is merely careless decorative work. Fashion and reputation have left their hall mark on the armor of each period, and like most other industries it had its distinguished masters. The name of Jacob Topf is, for example, still famous in England, and such names as those of Lorenzo Colman of Augsberg, a German armorer of the sixteenth century, Lucio Piccinino, a Milanese, and the Wolfs of Landshut, a family of armorers that are supposed to have [illegible]

LOOK AFTER YOUR HEALTH

If Your System Is Kept Toned Up You Will Escape Many Diseases That Find Easy Victims Among Pale People.

Enough disease germs enter the average human body every day to cause death if the healthful organism did not combat these germs and render them harmless.

Let the human system become run-down, or debilitated, and this power of resistance to disease is weakened. Soon the disease germs get the upper hand, an acute sickness follows or the patient becomes a chronic invalid.

It is in the blood that the battle to maintain the health is fought. Keep the blood toned up, the bowels open and observe ordinary care as regards food and rest and you will avoid much sickness.

Debility is not a recognized disease but is a condition in which the sufferer cannot get a good night's sleep, wakes up all tired out, has no strength or ambition, is nervous, has a poor appetite, has trouble with the stomach, and is subject to headaches and backaches. It is most commonly met with in people who have to work hard, are confined indoors, eat improper food or have worries and grief.

The case of Mrs. M. V. McCaslin, of No. 203 South 27th Street, Lincoln, Neb., shows the value of Dr. Williams' Pink Pills as a tonic for all run-down conditions of health. She says:

"I gave Dr. Williams' Pink Pills for Pale People a trial for general debility from which I had been suffering about three years. I was thoroughly tired and worn out and had no ambition for anything. I became very weak and kept losing strength. My appetite was poor and I was nervous and had severe headaches.

"I needed a tonic treatment and tried several tonic remedies but none seemed to help me until I tried Dr. Williams' Pink Pills for Pale People. I was soon much improved in health and able to get around and do my work. I took the pills until cured and am pleased to recommend them to anyone who is run down in health."

Dr. Williams' Pink Pills are for sale by all druggists, or will be sent, postpaid, on receipt of price, 50 cents per box; six boxes for $2.50 by the Dr. Williams Medicine Co., Schenectady, N. Y.

He said: "On one side is the right of things, and on the other is wrong; sometimes the difference between the two is slight. As the following story shows: A gypsy upon release from jail met a friend. 'What were you in for?' asked the friend.

"'I found a horse,' the gypsy replied.

"'Found a horse? Nonsense! They would never put you in jail for finding a horse.'

"'Well, but you see I found him before the owner lost him.'"

To Protect the Flowers.

Edelweiss and other characteristic Swiss flowers are said to be in danger of total extinction because of the craze of tourists for collecting them. Women tourists especially are always anxious to take away souvenirs in the way of a plant, and do not simply pull the flowers, but dig up the plant. It is proposed to introduce a law that will prevent the buying, selling or digging of edelweiss, fire lily, Siberian spring crocus, Alpine columbine, the Daphne, Alpine violet or other national flower.

Save the Babies.

INFANT MORTALITY is something frightful. We can hardly realize that of all the children born in civilized countries, twentytwo per cent., or nearly one-quarter, die before they reach one year; thirtyseven per cent., or more than one-third, before they are five, and one-half before they are fifteen!

We do not hesitate to say that a timely use of Castoria would save a majority of these precious lives. Neither do we hesitate to say that many of these infantile deaths are occasioned by the use of narcotic preparations. Drops, tinctures and soothing syrups sold for children's complaints contain more or less opium, or morphine. They are, in considerable quantities, deadly poisons. In any quantity they stupefy, retard circulation and lead to congestions, sickness, death. Castoria operates exactly the reverse, but you must see that it bears the signature of Chas. H. Fletcher. Castoria causes the blood to circulate properly, opens the pores of the skin and allays fever.

Dr. A. F. Peeler, of St. Louis, Mo., says: "I have prescribed your Castoria in many cases and have always found it an efficient and speedy remedy."

Dr. Frederick D. Rogers, of Chicago, Ill., says: I have found Fletcher's Castoria very useful in the treatment of children's complaints.

Dr. William C. Bloomer, of Cleveland, Ohio, says: In my practice I am glad to recommend your Castoria, knowing it is perfectly harmless and always satisfactory.

Dr. E. Down, of Philadelphia, Pa., says: "I have prescribed your Castoria in my practice for many years with great satisfaction to myself and benefit to my patients."

Dr. Edward Parrish, of Brooklyn, N. Y., says: "I have used your Castoria in my own household with good results, and have advised several patients to use it for its mild laxative effect and freedom from harm."

Dr. J. B. Elliott, of New York City, says: "Having during the past six years prescribed your Castoria for infantile stomach disorders, I most heartily commend its use. The formula contains nothing deleterious to the most delicate of children."

Dr. C. G. Sprague, of Omaha, Neb., says: "Your Castoria is an ideal medicine for children, and I frequently prescribe it. While I do not advocate the indiscriminate use of proprietary medicines, yet Castoria is an exception for conditions which arise in the care of children."

Dr. J. A. Parker, of Kansas City, Mo., says: "Your Castoria holds the esteem of the medical profession in a manner held by no other proprietary preparation. It is a sure and reliable medicine for infants and children. In fact, it is the universal household remedy for infantile ailments."

Dr. H. F. Merrill, of Augusta, Me., says: "Castoria is one of the very finest and most remarkable remedies for infants and children. In my opinion your Castoria has saved thousands from an early grave. I can furnish hundreds of testimonials from this locality as to its efficiency and merits."

The Bright Bermudas

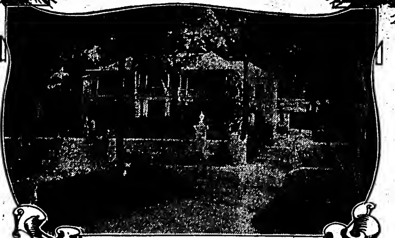
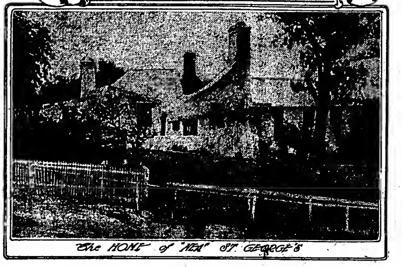
ROYAL PALMS

A STREET IN ST. GEORGE'S



A BERMUDA RESIDENCE



The HOME of "NEA" ST. GEORGE'S

THE gad-about, globe-trotting English and Americans, always looking for something new, have turned their restlessness to good account and located many a pleasant corner, favored by nature, on the old earth. Also, they spread the glad tidings when they find a place worth while, and straight way many others follow, to see for themselves. In this way the play-grounds of the Americans have been established.

Let a place be comparatively easy of access, have attractions of climate and scenery, natural beauty and historic interest, its fortune is made or its doom is sealed, depending upon the way you look at it. For the tourist, be he of the globe-trotting or the annual vacation variety, will begin to turn his face thither, in ever increasing numbers.

There are the Bermuda Islands, for instance. They are about forty hours sail (pretty snappy sailing) from New York, and the number of tourists who visit them annually outnumbers the native population by a third. It is no wonder, for within so short a distance of the rush and roar and turmoil and splendor and splurge of New York, lies this small group of many islands; a little, tranquil, well-governed, easy-going world, made up of dark green verdure, gay with flowers, set in the most vividly blue sea that ever was. Imagine a New Yorker in the thick of things, weary of winter and more weary of strife, with his fancy turning to a place where there is no hurry, no worry, no skyscrapers, no hoarse horn of automobile, no clang of trolley nor splutter of motorcycle, no brass band, vociferous newly-rich, no abject, incapable, disheartening poverty, and where no one seems anxious to get his money away from him by hook or crook; it is no wonder that the spring-time isles look good to him. And the Chicagoan, in his big, sooty, slovenly town, living whole-heartedly where they have "two seasons—winter and August," where the thermometer skips from withering heat to shivering cold in an hour or so and the population believes in the coming of spring in the face of everything to the contrary. A small bright, sightly world, made up of deep green islands, set in a sea of turquoise and sheltered by a wall of reefs, never very cold, never very hot, always bright with sunlight, Bermuda appeals to him.

The islands are dotted with towns and villages; quaint, old-time places, with narrow lanes of streets. The houses are built of coral rock and look as if they might last forever. This coral rock is easy to quarry and is sawed in blocks for building. It seems to answer every purpose and makes a fire department next to superfluous. So many islands (one for every day in the year, they tell you) make any number of little bays and harbors and occasionally short stretches of beautiful beach. The clean sand is either gleaming white or pale pink from the admixture of tiny particles of red coral. The roadways wind about, climbing and descending over the rolling surface, and walled with coral rock, which has been cut away to make the grades easy. These roadways wind too much and those in the villages are too narrow for automobiles. Besides the auto would not harmonize with the scheme of things and is not needed; for the Bermudian world is so small. The total area is only about twenty square miles.

The drives are delightful with their walls of coral lined with flowering shrubs and their continuous panorama of lovely views. The oleander and hybiscus make additional walls of blossoms. Bermuda lilies and purple morning glories are everywhere. The blossoms are very large. Every little way one glimpses a comfortable looking home set back among cedar trees and provided with lawn and flowers and thrifty garden patches. And the vivid sea is always near. It seems a kindly world, inhabited by kindly, self-respecting people. The islands are really very poor in natural resources; the soil is shallow and carefully conserved, only twelve-inch in depth on an average. But the people make the most of what they have. There are no fields of grain, but the good, old, faithful Bermuda onion brings many a dollar home, and potatoes, celery and lettuce are shipped to New York. Lilies are cultivated for export, the bulbs bringing in a respectable revenue. But the tourists, they are the "crop" that is most important. Big hotels and little ones, inns and tea-rooms, show places, carriages, sailing craft and shops are all subsisting upon the growing stream of visitors that flows to them. The tourists actually go hunting about for souvenirs for which to spend money and the supply is really meagre. There are few things made in Bermuda or found in Bermuda offered for sale. The shop keepers don't make a pretense that their trinkets are produced in the islands. This is refreshing, any way, and the surprised patron buys a pin with an angelfish on it, of enamel (made in Sweden), or a strand of coral (from Italy), out of sheer thankfulness and goes on his way rejoicing.

The shops are antiquated, according to American ideas, but that is part of the charm of the place. The Bermudians do not need to strive to be up-to-date. The islands are like a maid whom fate has seen fit to dower with superb beauty and charm but no money. King Cophetua (in the guise of the New Yorker) and everybody else stands ready to fairly worship her and burn insense in the shape of money before her.

Nature has provided the islands with many curious show places in addition to natural beauty. There are caves with strange and beautiful formations of stalactites and stalagmites. There are grottoes and pools and bays and tiny islands, as round as a wedding ring, and as alluring. There are the famous sea gardens where everyone goes in glass-bottomed boats to see the fishes at home, through the clear water. But they can be seen best at the Aquarium on Agar Island.

This structure was built for a magazine by the British government, and is rented to the Bermuda Biological Society for a trifling amount with the understanding that the government may take possession upon short notice, at any time, in case of necessity. Here one may see the wonderfully colored fishes, as vivid as jewels, and many curious inhabitants of the sea. Some of them are hideous to look at, like the octopus, and some of them seem grotesque replicas of land animals.

Bermuda is garrisoned by a regiment of British Infantry. On Sunday mornings the garrison parade followed by music of the military band tempts a throng of people to Prospect Barracks. The band is exceptionally fine and gives a concert twice during the week in Hamilton, the capital of the islands.

The Dockyard is one of the show places, being an important naval station, and Gibb's Hill Lighthouse, whose long flight of winding steps it is worth while to climb, is another. From here there is an unforgetable view of the whole of the little world of Bermuda, set in the vast, glorious ocean, and a chance to see at close range the great lamp.

But what pleases the child of the hustling, modern, changing "States" most of all, is the quaintness of the old towns. At St. George, the former capital, everything it seems remains about as it was two or three centuries ago. The oldest church, St. Peter's, still uses its silver communion service, the gift of William III. The Governor's pew and the Admiral's pew make us smile at their antiquated attempts at pomp but the beautiful tablets on the wall lead the fancy quickly back to the beginning of things for us. There is so much dignity and grave grace in the language of tribute to "Alured Popple Esq. The Good Governor," and on other tablets setting forth the virtues that we still delight to honor. And between the lines on many, or in a single word, is betrayed the longing for home and England which in those days was so very far away.

Think of the courage necessary to face a sea voyage which might last a few months! Think of it especially after the usual experience in sailing from New York to these fair isles in two days on a fine modern steamship. All those smartly dressed ladies and brisk, valient looking men who came aboard the night before, where are they the morning after? They are wishing they had a tablet erected to their memory—anywhere. Everybody gets seasick on the way to Bermuda, and it is never any better coming back—it's worse. But this is a part of the play and considered so beneficial that to be exempt entitles you to feel that you haven't had your money's worth.

There are a number of things, besides the delightful climate and the old ducking stool, which we would gladly bring back to these United States with us. Among them are the gentle manners and voices of the people and their high average of education (everybody has to go to school there), and, above all, the general tidiness of everything and everybody. There are no unsightly scrap-heaps there. The only things near them are a few old, dismantled, sailing boats, moored in a quiet bay, sorrowfully waiting to be cut up into firewood. Their day is done long ago and that of the Lusitania is here. But sailing craft still transport freight in Bermudian waterways and ferrymen carry passengers in row boats between the villages. It is very charming, this glimpse of antiquated, leisurely, cheerful life, within easy reach of us.

Wooing Covers Four Nations

Wealthy Nephew of Diaz Was Attentive to an Actress and Persistently Followed Her.

Ending a courtship which began in Cuba, crossed into Mexico, slipped back into Colorado, skipped over into Canada, and finally to Connecticut, Isidoro De La Torre, a young and wealthy nephew of the former President Diaz of Mexico, married Miss Callie Andrews of Brooklyn, an actress.

Mexican politics helped make the course of love far from smooth. When his uncle was forced to leave Mexico, De La Torre, whose father had been an adherent of the former president, found it necessary to leave, too. Indeed, De La Torre was told that if he remained in Mexico he would have his throat cut.

So he came to this country, and after a time started on a visit to Havana. On the steamer was Miss Andrews with a theatrical troupe, which was to tour Cuba, opening in Havana. Miss Andrews was attractive, lively and 20 years old. Senor De La Torre was good looking, wealthy, ardent and 21. Presumably it was moonlight on the Caribbean Sea, and any way the Southern Cross shone brightly in the sky. The young man fell in love and said so to almost anybody who would listen to him, but especially to Miss Andrews. She listened to him carefully.

In Havana the young folks quarreled and Miss Andrews left the theatrical company and Cuba in a hurry and went to Mexico City.

That was precisely where the young man could not follow her. De La Torre wrote bushels of letters to Miss Andrews and kept a submarine cable hot with messages imploring forgiveness.

Miss Andrews relented enough to go to Pueblo, Colo., and there her lover met her, and there was another quarrel after a short interval of blissful peace. Miss Andrews vanished again and this time brought up in Montreal, where she was located by Senor De La Torre.

Where to Look for Heroes.

Through many generations the habit of mind has become fixed and with rare exceptions we look for heroism on the field of activity alone. It is easy to see in the midst of battle where men are struggling with each other, easy to see in the cab of the locomotive which is rushing to destruction as the engineer stands with his hand upon the throttle, easy to see in the collision at sea when superhuman strength or restraint are exhibited, and yet how faintly do these instances compare with the heroism of the sick room or the [illegible]. When there is no excitement [illegible] to [illegible] Almost anyone can [illegible] endure and wait. Most of us can talk, but only a few can keep silent. Many there are who can give generously; few there be who can receive gracefully. The spectacular is easy, the commonplace is hard. And we are mostly commonplace. But after all there is the field of the heroic and there the glory of humanity is won.—Universalist Leader.

After the $100 Bills.

Every time Arthur Krohn's fireman picks up a piece of waste now Arthur seizes it and says: "Let me do that!" Arthur gets the waste as soon as it comes into his engine and tears it all to pieces, looking for hundred-dollar bills.

Every railroad man on the Big Four knows Arthur Krohn is the special engineer for engine 24, which Vice-President Burnett uses when he inspects the system. Arthur's fireman picked up a piece of waste to wipe the engine at Cincinnati recently, and in tearing it apart he came across the ends of five $100 bills. There was just enough there to tell that they had been $100 bills and not enough for Krohn or his fireman to send in to Washington and say that the bulldog had seized the bill when the children were playing with them and had swallowed the other part and would the government please send new ones, as they were needed at home.

The ends of the bills were stuck together and there was no way to tell how they got into the waste—[illegible]

Cling to Ancient Gaslight

British Statesmen Conduct Deliberations Without the Aid of Modern Illumination.

The system of lighting the British house of commons is under review, and members may be asked before long whether they would prefer electric to the present use of gas. The actual fount of the illumination is not visible in the house; there is no chandelier, and none of those brackets against the wall which one sees in modern drawing-rooms against distempered walls. But the roof has a considerable space of thick ground glass panels set in a framework of brown beams, and each of the panels bears a rendering of the English red rose. Above this glass there is a kind of attic from which the lighting is done.

The house is very often sparing of the gas bill. On a quiet summer afternoon the debate will go on in the fading light of day till members can hardly see one another's faces, and then the clerk of the house suddenly realizes that he cannot see the paper under his nose. He looks up and finds the house wrapped in shadows. He touches a bell; a servant comes in and receives the direction for the lights. The light is turned on in the attic above the glass panels with the rendering of the red roses. It arrives in the house like a shower of rain [illegible] tive stirring, a softening, a sponge in the face, then after that the deluge, and the room below is drenched in a mellow downpour. The dark spaces beneath the galleries drink it up like a thirsty land. The whole scene is refreshed. Strangers in the house look up into the roof, and then they sit up and begin a more intelligent reading of the men and things below.

Initiative and Referendum.

The recall, together with the initiative and referendum, are institutions of Switzerland, where they have been established for many years. The recall became law in this country for the first time when Los Angeles put it into its city charter in 1903. From what source in this country the idea came is not exactly certain, but it was a part of the agitation of the last decade of the nineteenth century, which gave the country the Farmers' Alliance, the People's party and similar movements. There does not seem to be any one man's name prominently connected with the recall; it arose out of the popular enthusiasm for "direct legislation," that is, for making the people directly responsible for important measures instead of leaving them in the hands of elected representatives. It is now a doctrine quite generally accepted among "Progressives" of both parties, Democratic and Republican.

JAPS IMPORT THEIR BRIDES

Orientals in Hawaii Send All the Way to the Flowery Kingdom for Them.

Kauai, Hawaii.—"No more Orientals of the laboring class are coming to Hawaii, and a good many of our white citizens who cultivate sugar estates are sorry that the faithful Chinese are barred under the law," said W. P. Harcourt, a sugar planter of the island of Kauai, one of the Hawaiian group. "They are our best workers, and before the exclusion policy was applied we could count on a certain regular influx of brawny Mongolians to toil in the cane fields.

"The Chinese now in Hawaii have been there for many years, and most of them are getting to be old men. Not many of the Chinese have wives, but in former days not a few of them became the husbands of the native Kanaka women. It was a good cross, was this half-breed progeny, and so likewise the offspring of the Japanese and native women. In recent times, however, the Japs have been in the habit of sending back to their own land for wives. In most cases I think the self-elected bridegrooms get their parents back in the Flowery Kingdom to pick out wives for them.

Types of Japanese Dancing Girls.

"The matter is finally arranged through the Japanese consul, the man in the case putting up money for the passage of his intended spouse. The hour that she lands must also be the wedding hour, for the authorities will not allow the fair ones to remain unless claimed and formally mated according to some civil or religious ceremony that both parties consider binding.

"Every now and then a wireless message comes to my plantation which tells one of my young Japanese hired men that he may expect on the arrival of the next ship at Honolulu the girl who has been picked out as his wife. I do not think that in many cases the principals have ever laid eyes on each other. On the receipt of the message the man gets permission to go to claim his wife, and pretty soon the pair are domesticated on the estate, and my understanding is they get on as happily as if they had known each other from infancy and been wedded in the conventional way of the Caucasians.

"Not long ago a ship from Yokohama arrived with forty or fifty so-called picture brides. Every one of them had been chosen through photographs forwarded to Hawaii some time in advance of the arrival of the originals. Occasionally there is a pathetic case, as when not long ago a very pretty young Japanese maid was forced to take the next ship returning to her old home. Inspection showed that she had trachoma, and the rigid rule that ordered her deportation could not be waived."—Baltimore American.

MAN GETS LONG LOST $10

Money in Hands of New York Police Chief Since October 11 Is Restored to Owner.

New York.—A ten dollar bill lost on Broadway October 11 is now in the hands of the owner, after having been for eight months in the hands of Police Commissioner Waldo. More than 1,000 persons applied to the commissioner for the money, but it remained for John F. J. Sheehan of Newark, N. J., to make the successful claim.

The bill was turned over to a traffic policeman October 11 by William Fleuger of Berlin, Germany, who said that the bill had blown into his face at Forty-second street and Broadway. Sheehan explained that the money was blown from his hand by a gust of wind. He had witnesses to prove his claim.

CITY IS ENRICHED BY RAID

County in Pennsylvania Reaps Harvest of Nickels From Broken Slot Machines.

Pittsburg, Pa.—All sorts of games of chance have been put under the law's watchful eyes here. County detectives have confiscated hundreds of slot machines, brought them to the courthouse and broken them with an ax. As each machine was broken the chief of detectives was "on the job" with a dishpan to gather the nickels. The county is hundreds of dollars richer.

Expert Says Pies Always in Demand

WE SELL MORE PIE AS EVER— Y'UNDERSTAN'
¼ PIE 3¢

NEW YORK.—Sol. Rohinski, who had taken Phil Breitenkopf's place at the Busy Bee's pie counter, while Phil was up in the Catskills on his vacation, said he had never heard of Simple Simon and the pieman, so that he could not go back to the very beginning of the history of the pie industry. But Sol could glance backward from his Ann street booth over a period of eleven and one-half years of service in the making, carving and serving of fresh pies, and it was his opinion that, take it the year round, winter and summer, and all the rest, pie was about the best seller in Ann street.

Which was a flat contradiction of the startling news which throbbed over the wires the other day from Chicago, that the American people were losing their taste for pie.

As luck would have it, the Chicago canard reached Ann street just as the rush hour for pies—pies and other things, of course, like those luscious hot roasted frankfurters, those tempting one-cent ice cream cones, and those tall, amber-colored glasses of one-cent orangeade, to mention only a few of the Busy Bee's noontime delicacies.

Sol has a wide, all-round experience in Ann street and they say he is the highest salaried man in the Busy Bee's employ, but in the matter of pie he is not the equal of his old tutor, Phil Breitenkopf.

"In hot weather, it is all pie, pie, pie. For three cents they get half a pie, and for two cents they get a glass of milk. Perhaps if they have more than five cents for lunch, y'understand, they blow it in on root beer or ice cream co-en, but first they must have pie and milk."

While he talked, Sol kept both hands working dishing out pies. There were all kinds. As Sol said, there was fresh epfel and huckleberry and custard and lemon meringk. All very fine. The boys would point to this kind or that, and Sol would bisect it with his long knife, balance the half on the flat of the blade and pass a toothsome morsel out over the heads of the crowd.

Cupid Halts Court While Lovers Wed

CHICAGO.—Cupid stole into Municipal Judge Dolan's court the other afternoon, became so noisy that he interrupted the proceedings for a full half hour and finally forced the court to give him precedence over all legal matters.

The court room was warm and a trial had been dragging along throughout the day. There had been a constant buzzing noise in the rear of the room that was extremely disconcerting.

The buzzing continued and the judge's eye finally rested on a couple on a bench in the rear of the room. They were casting loving glances and talking in animated tones.

The judge could stand it no longer and looked for his trusty bailiff. He was not in evidence. Then the court rose in his might and said:

"You two in the back of the court room will have to stop talking. I can't hear the witness. If you want to spoon you will have to go outside. The court is no place for it."

The hands slid apart and the man rose.

"I beg your pardon, your honor," he said. "We come in here to get married and were waiting for you to get through with the case. We didn't come in here to spoon and we didn't mean to, but we just couldn't help it."

The attorneys engaged in the trial, W. M. Cook and Benjamin Semuels, at once moved that court take a recess that the ceremony might be performed. The judge said that he would be only too happy to do so.

"Now that the case of Dan Cupid has been disposed of, we will resume the trial," said Judge Dolan.

Fair Bathers and Big Rats Use Beach

EVANSTON, ILL.—Fair bathers and thousands of rats are contesting for the possession of the bathing beach between Dempster street and Greenwood boulevard.

Thus far the honors are about even in the warfare which has been going on for nearly a week. The rats have been unable to prevent the bathers from invading the beach, and the bathers have been unable to frighten away the rats.

Where all the rats came from is not known, but the fact remains that thousands of the rodents have burrowed into the sides of the bank along the beach, dug holes in the sand and sought refuge under the piers.

Many bathers, while walking along the beach, have suddenly stepped into holes which the rats have dug, and have been filled with dismay when, with angry squeal, large gray and brown rats have turned and snapped at them.

John J. Morgan, manager of a company which is engaged in the work of exterminating vermin, stated that it was not an unusual thing for rats to take up their abode along the lake shores in summer. The hundreds of dead fish which are cast up by the waves, he said, attract the rats in large numbers. "The rats burrow in the sand, at the foot of the banks, in large numbers," said Mr. Morgan. "Then, too, the hot weather may have something to do with the condition. The rats will swim out in the water in hot weather and will also make their homes in the wet sands along the edge of the water."

The rats in many cases are extremely large and savage, and threaten to attack persons who disturb them.

Fish Coal Out of the Susquehanna

PHILADELPHIA.—When coal is needed on a Pennsylvania farm bordering the Susquehanna river, little Johnnie does not grab his coal hod and scoot for the cellar. Instead he unfastens his boat, pulls out into the river and fishes till his hod is overflowing.

To be sure, Johnnie doesn't fish with rod and line, nor yet with a net. His apparatus consists of a wire scoop, shaped like a shovel and not dissimilar to a minnow net, with an eight-foot handle. And his boat is a broad, flat-bottomed affair, sometimes with sharp bows, built like a scow, with the maximum of capacity and the minimum of draught; for the coal fisher's catch is usually made in shallow water.

And the catch is unlike any coal you ever saw. This run of the river coal comes in all sizes, from little flakes to chunks as big as your head. But mostly it is smaller than pea coal. Coal from the mines is bright and shiny and all angles that reflect the light.

River coal is neither angular nor shiny. Every piece of it is worn down, buffed, rounded off like a beach pebble, with an exterior as dull as ground glass. To the uninitiated a heap of river coal looks exactly like a pile of black pebbles. But let a piece of it be cracked open and the shiny heart stands forth like the meat in a hickory nut.

Ever since men began delving for coal the operator has cast aside as refuse thousands upon thousands of tons of good coal, flung it out on the culm heaps. What is his loss is the gain of the coal fishers in the river below. Into this stream, by way of its feeders, the mountain brooks, coal is washed by the rains, which gnaw deep gullies in the [illegible] of the culm banks.

IN THE LIMELIGHT

NELLIE GRANT WEDS AGAIN

The marriage recently of Mrs. Nellie Grant Sartoris to Frank H. Jones, a Chicago banker, was in sharp contrast to her first marriage, 38 years ago, to Algernon J. Sartoris, an English army officer.

Nellie Grant was then the idol of the nation and her marriage took place in the east room of the White House while her distinguished father was president. It was one of the greatest social events the White House had seen up to that time, or perhaps since. Simple, amiable and unaffected, Nellie Grant, the only daughter of General Grant, had endeared herself to the American people and she went with her husband to their English home accompanied by the heartiest good wishes.

In England she was presented to Queen Victoria and dined at Windsor Castle. Yet her life in England proved most unhappy. Her husband treated her with injustice and cruelty, so much so that her father-in-law's sympathy was aroused in her behalf and he made earnest efforts to effect a restoration of good feeling between husband and wife.

BIDDLE'S UNIQUE METHODS

It is a far cry from prize fighting to religion. At first blush it seems most sacrilegious to associate the two subjects. But it has been done successfully not only in words but in deeds, and, as results have proven, it is the basis of one of the most remarkable religious movements this country has ever seen.

The man back of this novel idea for furthering the cause of Christianity is Anthony J. Drexel Biddle, millionaire, of Philadelphia, Pa., who but a few years back became famous as an amateur boxer and an object of criticism and source of disgust to the ultra-exclusive set of the Quaker City of which he is a member. But withal "Tony" Biddle proved himself a practical pugilist—one who loved the manly art only for the manliness which it brought out; one who stood for honesty and high ideals and who was ever a gentleman.

When Mr. Biddle conceived the idea of his Bible class movement, his secret motive—if such it may be called—was to introduce athletics as an inducement to young men, and when he took charge of his first class in the Sunday school of Holy Trinity Protestant Episcopal church, Philadelphia, four years ago, he had but three members, and the attendance of the school was very slim at the time.

So rapidly has the Drexel Biddle Bible class grown that it now numbers 700 members.

MARSHALL NEW IN POLITICS

Gov. Thomas R. Marshall of Indiana, the Democratic nominee for vice-president, rode to the front of his party on a wave of reform. But the Indiana wave was not so boisterous as those that broke on the New Jersey coast and elsewhere. Governor Marshall believes in reform—in moderation. Also he believes in progressing—with moderation. He does not believe that this great and glorious commonwealth is going to the "demnition bow-wows;" in fact, he points with pride to his belief that the country is just a little bit better politically, financially and morally than ever before.

It required heroic measures on the part of his friends to induce Governor Marshall to take his presidential chances seriously, and even then he refused to allow any effort to be made in his behalf outside of Indiana.

Governor Marshall was born in Manchester, Ind., in 1854 and has spent his entire fifty-eight years in his native state. He was graduated from Wabash college in 1873, when he was twenty-one years old. He practiced law in Columbia City, Ind., until he was elected governor two years ago. He is a member of many clubs and holds LL.D. degrees from Wabash, Notre Dame and the University of Pennsylvania. He married Miss Lois I. Kimsey of Angola, Ind., in 1885.

In the Literary State they call Marshall the "Little Giant." When one sees him for the first time he wonders why, because there is nothing colossal about the slender, undersized man with sloping shoulders and quiet mien.

HILL'S REMARKABLE CAREER

The retirement of James J. Hill from his position as chairman of the board of directors of the Great Northern railroad, which has just become effective, was officially announced Monday from the office of the company at St. Paul.

The resignation of Mr. Hill was presented to the board of directors June 7, and unofficial reports of the changes were made at the time, but the statement with which Mr. Hill accompanies his resignation was made public only a few days ago.

Louis W. Hill, who was recently succeeded by Carl R. Gray as president of the Great Northern, succeeds his father as chairman of the board of directors. James J. Hill will remain a member of the executive committee of the board.

With his retirement Mr. Hill completed thirty-three years of active service in the northwest, beginning with his purchase of an interest in the St. Paul and Pacific, of which he [illegible] general manager, to the time of his resignation from the [illegible] since he resigned the presidency [illegible]

NATIONAL CAPITAL AFFAIRS

Religious Articles Made in Bethlehem

WASHINGTON.—The chief industry today of the town of Bethlehem in Palestine is the manufacture of articles of religious devotion and ornaments from mother-of-pearl, according to the report of the American consul there. The methods and tools used are mostly quite primitive in character, as are also the buildings in which the workmen carry on their trade. The principal products are carved shells on which religious scenes are depicted, beads and rosaries. The material known as "pearl waste," from which the two latter products are made, is very largely imported from the United States, and the American market also is the largest purchaser of these goods.

A bead workman's outfit is primitive, consisting of files, borers and a simple wooden device for holding the irregularly shaped pieces of pearl waste. This last is made of a short, round piece of wood sawed in half lengthwise, fastened together at one end and encircled by a loose iron ring. The piece of pearl shell is placed between the loose wooden ends and the ring is hammered toward it until the grip is tight. The workman then files the part of shell which extends to the desired diameter; it is reversed in the holder, and finally a rounded piece of perhaps one to three inches in length is secured.

To give them a gloss and sheen, they are finally placed in boiling water, to which a weak solution of nitric or muriatic acid is added.

These beads are strung on cords, silk or wire, and always on the latter in the case of rosaries.

Baby Finger Prints System Favored

IF an increase in the number of abandoned infants in the city should occur, it is more than likely that there will be adopted by the district authorities a system of finger print identification of all infants born in public institutions. Such a system is now in use in New York, and other cities are contemplating its adoption. The results have proved encouraging. The system has the indorsement of Dr. William C. Woodward, district health officer, and George S. Wilson, secretary of the board of charities.

The only thing which stands in the path of the adoption of the finger print identification system in the national capital is the small number of cases of abandoned children. It is hardly believed that the number would justify the introduction of the scheme.

"The plan is an excellent one," said Dr. Woodward. "It has been given an extensive trial in New York city. Reports of the experiment as made public in recent numbers of certain magazines show that the system is a success."

The plan is to take impressions of the fingers of all infants born in public institutions, especially in charity cases, from which issue most of the abandonments. These finger prints are filed on cards, together with minute descriptions of the mothers of the infants. If after leaving the hospital an infant is abandoned, a finger print is immediately taken and the files are searched for the corresponding print. If the finger print is identified, the description of the mother is given to the police, who starts out upon her trail.

BABY FINGER PRINT SYST TO STOP ABANDOMEN

The finger-print files are kept in some central place, the various hospitals sending in cards for every infant born. It has been clearly demonstrated that the print taken of a child's finger is sufficiently distinct to make out the lines easily with the aid of an ordinary magnifying glass.

Good Showing Made by Enlisted Men

THEATRE
DEM SAILOR GUYS AINT LIKE DEY USTER WAS —DE COUNTRY ISS GOIN' TER DE BOW WOWS

IF there is one thing that wins the heart of a layman who is accorded the privilege of shipping on board a United States navy vessel, says a writer in Leslie's, it is the showing made by the enlisted men. He is the lad who stands by his officers in the conning tower, below the water line in the torpedo room, at the highest point of the fire control mast, or in the depths of the sweltering fire rooms. The intricate modern warship sounded the death knell of idleness and ignorance. A man to be of use in the navy today must be ambitious, intelligent and trustworthy in every sense. One who has not those qualifications soon learns that he must "buck up" if he is to be part of the great machine of which we are so proud.

No factor has contributed more to the marvellous evolution of the navy than the manner in which this particular man has bucked up and within a comparatively brief period changed the personnel of the sailors to as fine as that of any in the world.

Here is an example worth repeating. Six years ago an officer, who is now on board the cruiser Washington, was in charge of a liberty party of 250 men in New York who had shore leave for twenty-four hours. At the expiration of that time less than half of them were in a fit condition to return to the ship. They had gotten themselves into all sorts of trouble. Last summer the same officer took an equal number of men ashore at New York. It was a liberty party in exactly the condition of the previous one. But it served to illustrate what a change had taken place in the navy in these comparatively few years. Every man returned to the landing at the appointed time. Instead of passing their time brawling about, as had been the fashion in the time before, it was ascertained that these men had attended theaters and gone to the museums—in short had seen the city in the way any ordinary red-blooded citizen might who had that interval to spend in New York.

Live Frog in Stomach Nearly a Year

A LIVE frog that crawled and clawed and croaked, lived for nearly a year in the stomach of Mrs. L. V. King of Dean Wood, a suburb of Washington.

After clawing away at the lining of the woman's stomach until it was raw with pain, almost strangling her as it climbed into her throat, and fairly reducing her to a living skeleton it was finally extricated by physicians of the Emergency hospital. They used a large pump.

The frog is now preserved in alcohol. It is a weak, colorless, wrinkled, shapeless specimen which bears a faint resemblance to the normal frog. Its legs are long and scranny and thin as toothpicks. It measures, all told, about seven inches.

Just as it was breaking out of the egg, the tadpole was swallowed by Mrs. King in well water last August. Weeks passed before the woman realized there was some living animal in her stomach. She consulted doctors, but they laughed at her.

Last spring the frog, now reaching to its full growth, began to climb into her throat and nearly suffocated her. It clawed away at the membrane until she several times fainted with pain. Still the doctors, when she told them of her fears, laughed.

Two months ago Mrs. King declares the frog began to croak. She distinctly heard it many times and her relatives hear her out. That determined her to leave the physicians of Dean Wood severely alone and consult "city doctors."

She did so. She went to the Emergency hospital and the frog was pumped out of its hiding place.

The frog lived ten minutes in a tub of water. It croaked and sang just like any regular frog. Then it died.

HOLIDAYS AND THEIR USES.

When it first occurred to any one to celebrate an event or commemorate a person, by cessation from toil and giving up a day to idleness, amusement and festivity, is not known, but it must have been early in the history of social evolution. In the savage state of existence men lived from hand to mouth, and were obliged to hunt or fish every day to get their living. In a more advanced stage, when tillage of the soil became general, when the year's crops were garnered and stored, there came a time when work could be intermitted, and it was doubtless then that the first holiday was instituted. It was natural to signalize the annual ripening and gathering of the fruits of the earth by some sort of rejoicing, and it was natural, too, that the manifestation of renewed life in the spring should receive similar recognition. These autumn and spring festivals may be called the natural holidays. Once holidays were started, it is not strange that they grew in number, says the Cincinnati Enquirer. It is for most a world of toil and sweat and grime that we live in, and an occasional break accompanied by a little recreation and change of mental and physical environment, is necessary and salutary. Consequently all sorts of occasions and events were availed of to make holidays.

Present education, though very far from presenting an unpromising aspect, shows glaring inefficiencies that should be looked at squarely so that they may be removed. For instance, a very large proportion of the public school teachers in the country are minors, and less than half of them have had any special or adequate preparation for teaching; in several states from 20 to 30 per cent. of them every year are beginners; and in the best states the average length of service is less than four years. The average wage of all public school teachers in the United States, including the teachers in all our cities is $1.60 a day for the working days of the whole year—less than $500 per annum; or less than $10 a week, says the World's Work. The average pay in eleven states is less than $400; in eight states, it is less than $300; in two states, less than $250.

Eggs have been hatched in Egypt in ovens for hundreds of years. Incubators that hold from 30,000 to 60,000 eggs are still in existence, where for generations about 70 per cent. of each heating have been successfully batched. Egypt is a great exporter of eggs, as many as 83,000,000 eggs having been shipped from that ancient land in one winter. Even in this country it would be considered a very large undertaking to handle an incubator large enough for 60,000 eggs. In Egypt they do the trick in brick ovens which are heated for ten days and then require no more attention.

While digging the foundations for a hospital to be built at Neuchatel, workmen lately discovered a beautiful vault constructed of bronze, which Swiss scientists state was built 600 years before the birth of Jesus Christ. In the tomb was the skeleton of a young woman, whose bones were still in a natural position. On the wrists were six bracelets, four in bronze and two in lignite, and near the skeleton was a little bronze bell.

Is disease spreading from public laundries? The question has been undergoing debate in New York for some time. A physician suggests that all possibility of danger may be averted by thoroughly moistening the contents of packages with a disinfectant solution as soon as they arrive in the laundry. This practice, he says, is followed in England. There is a general conviction among men in the laundry business that thorough disinfection results from the subjection of the articles to the process of steaming and washing.

A New York husband, sued for divorce, characterizes his wife's mother as like to one of the knitting women of the French guillotine, says that Scrooge was an angel of light compared to her father, that the members of her family collectively are worshippers of the golden calf and that his wife herself is a reincarnation of Judas Iscariot. One can easily imagine what kind of a grand, sweet song marriage was in that happy home.

STORM KILLS MANY

DEATH AND DESOLATION IS REVEALED AS FLOODS RECEDE IN PENNSYLVANIA.

SCORES SLOWLY STARVING

Town of Dunbar Is a Total Wreck—Loss Is Estimated at Million—Bridges Have Been Swept Away and Traffic Is at Standstill.

Pittsburg, Pa., July 27.—The county of Fayette, sixty miles south of here, that was swept by a series of cloudbursts, began to count its loss Thursday. At least nineteen lives were lost, 14 in the Polecat mine near Evans Station, three drowned at Lemont No. 2 mine when the creek broke through the roof and flooded the workings. A boy fell into the flooded street at Dunbar and was drowned.

Dunbar is a wreck. The county commissioners estimate that nearly a million dollars' damage was done there alone. Eleven business houses were swept away, seventy-five residences were destroyed, streets torn and bridges torn out.

Fayette county is isolated. The Pennsylvania and the Baltimore & Ohio tracks are either under water or swept away. Wires are down everywhere. Not a trolley road is operating and it is impossible to get provisions.

Provision trains left Pittsburg early but have been unable to get within fourteen miles of Dunbar, and hunger is being added to the misery of the people.

The Pennsylvania railroad has a thousand men at work repairing its roadbed, and it is hoped to get trains into parts of the stricken district.

All through the county mines, coke ovens, quarries, chemical works and other industrial plants are shut down, and for weeks hundreds of men will be out of work. The damage to the coke ovens is enormous and will likely cause a worse coke famine than has ever been experienced by the trade.

Four bridges of the Baltimore & Ohio and the big Pennsylvania structure at Gist Run were washed out. The entire equipment of the Bluestone quarries, four miles above Dunbar, was carried down on the flood and lodged against the First National bank building. Impossible even now to estimate the full damage.

Wausau, Wis., July 26.—Flood damage estimated at $1,400,000 was wrought from the breaking of two dams on the Wisconsin river north of Wausau.

In the same case President Samuel Gompers recently was sentenced to one year and Secretary Frank Morrison to six months' imprisonment.

The three labor men were accused of having published a boycott after the District of Columbia supreme court had issued an order against it.

LA FOLLETTE WINS

SENATE PASSES WISCONSIN SENATOR'S WOOL BILL BY VOTE OF 46 TO 20.

PENROSE PLAN IS INDORSED

Badger Statesman Springs Surprise by Introducing 1911 Measure After Upper House Had Defeated Cummins Substitute Measure 57 to 14.

Washington, July 27.—After sitting in committee of the whole Thursday, the senate defeated the Cummins wool bill, adopted the Penrose compromise measure by 34 to 32 and finally passed the La Follette wool bill of 1911, the Democrats and insurgents voting together after a day of differences.

The Cummins substitute wool tariff bill which represented the views of many of the "progressive" senators was defeated by an overwhelming majority when it came to a vote in the senate. Practically all progressives voted for it. The measure was defeated 57 to 14. The senators supporting it were Borah, Bourne, Bristow, Clapp, Crawford, Cummins, Gronna, Jones, Kenyon, La Follette, Nelson, Poindexter, Townsend and Works.

All Democrats and the balance of the Republicans voted against the Cummins bill. The defeat of this substitute had been anticipated, and the knowledge that a compromise measure had been prepared by the Republican leaders, to be offered as soon as the Cummins bill was disposed of, aided in preventing the so-called regular Republicans from supporting the Cummins bill.

Senator Penrose, acting on behalf of the Republican members of the finance committee, offered the Republican substitute as soon as the Cummins amendment had been voted down. It was the bill that had been prepared by Senator Lippitt of Rhode Island, and which had been circulated early in the day among the Republican members, both regular and progressive.

The Lippitt-Penrose bill was received in the spirit of a surprise by the Democratic side of the chamber, although the Democratic leaders were fairly aware that it would be presented as a counter move to their bill for a sweeping reduction of the woolen tariff. Demands were made from the Democratic side for more time to examine the measure, and the Republican members of the finance committee were criticized for submitting a measure that the senate did not have time to study.

TURKISH DEPUTIES HIT

ARMY OFFICERS DEMAND DISSOLUTION OF THE CHAMBER.

Letter Read at Session Says Action Must Be Taken at Once or Military Will Strike.

Constantinople, July 27.—The president of the chamber of deputies announced in the chamber on Thursday that a group of Turkish military officers had lodged a demand for the dissolution of the chamber. This announcement provoked uproarious scenes. The demand reached the president in the form of a letter bearing the seal of the military league and was couched in vigorous language.

"Your evil labors in committee and parliament," the letter read, "have done much harm. We do not wish to stain our hands in your soiled blood, but we warn you that the army and the people demand dissolution of the chamber. Failing compliance with this demand within forty-eight hours, we will do what is needed."

Violent speeches were made by several deputies, who declared that they would not move except at the point of the bayonet. The minister of war, Nazim Pacha, in behalf of the cabinet and professing that he was not aware of the existence of the league, announced that the government would endeavor to discover and punish the authors of the letter. The chamber then rose.

RECALL INDORSED IN IOWA

Initiative and Referendum Also Favored in Platform of Democrats.

Cedar Rapids, Ia.—Iowa Democrats put the principles of the initiative and referendum into practice when, on Thursday night, just before adjournment of the state convention, it was decided unanimously to submit the progressive platform adopted to the referendum vote of the rank and file of the party.

In addition to the platform, the convention utilized its final session in nominating two candidates for the supreme court, Maurice O'Connor of Fort Dodge, and John E. Craig of Lee county. O'Connor was named on the second and Craig on the third ballot from a field of ten aspirants.

The platform favors the initiative and referendum, direct nomination of all officers through primary elections; the presidential primary plan; demands the election of national and state committeemen by direct vote and that such committeemen assume authority upon receipt of certificate of election; favors government ownership of telegraph and telephone companies, physical valuation of railroads, employers' liability act and woman suffrage.

Des Moines, Ia., July 26.—The political policies advocated by Theodore Roosevelt and his candidacy for the presidency were indorsed by the state Progressive convention held here on Wednesday. Eight hundred delegates took part. Delegates were chosen to attend the national convention in Chicago August 5.

President Taft was denounced. He was accused of deserting the cause of the people to do the will of the bosses. Charges that the Baltimore and Chicago conventions were dominated by the same influence—that of the bosses—was made in the report of the resolutions committee, which was adopted unanimously.

Colonel Roosevelt was declared to be the greatest living exponent of political morals, and the committee report declared the election of a president left to the sound judgment of the voters would be between a Progressive candidate and the Democratic nominee.

Sends Resignation to Taft While Last Witnesses Wait to Testify in Impeachment Proceedings.

Seattle, Wash., July 24.—United States District Court Judge Cornelius H. Hanford, whose conduct on the bench has been under investigation for nearly a month by a subcommittee of the house judiciary committee, telegraphed on Monday last his resignation to President Taft.

The impeachment proceedings against the judge were the direct outgrowth of a decision rendered by him last spring declaring forfeited the naturalization papers of a resident of this city named Olsson because of his Socialist views. Hanford based his action on the ground that Olsson had deceived the court and that his radical opinions constituted a menace to the institutions of the country.

BEST DEFENCE AGAINST DISEASE

Is a Supply of Rich, Red Blood and Dr. Williams' Pink Pills Are the Tonic to Use When the Blood Is Thin and Weak.

Thin, impure blood is an invitation to sickness. The blood is at work, day and night, to maintain the health and any lack of strength or purity in the blood is a weakness in the defense against disease. Anaemia is the doctor's name for lack of blood. There may be an actual loss in the quantity of the blood or one or more of its constituents may be lacking. Its surest symptom is pallor. Anaemia is particularly common in young girls from 14 to 17 years of age. It is not confined to them for it is this same lack of blood that prevents full recovery after the grip, fevers, malaria and operations and is present in old age and in persons who have been under an unusual physical or mental strain.

Mrs. Morgan Bowen, of No. 2631 Fillmore street, N. E. Minneapolis, Minn., says:

"When I was 15 years old I went into a decline and my parents feared I was going into consumption. I was sick for a year and was not able to do much of anything. The sickness came on me gradually. I was pale and seemed to lose my strength. I was attending school at Winona at the time and became so nervous that I had to give up my studies. My parents were alarmed about my condition as there had been consumption in the family.

"A friend advised my mother to give me Dr. Williams' Pink Pills for Pale People and before I used them long I was much improved. I gave the pills a thorough trial and was fully restored to health. My health has been good since, but I always keep Dr. Williams' Pink Pills for Pale People in the house and take them when I feel I need a tonic."

The tonic treatment with Dr. Williams' Pink Pills by building up the blood so that it can nourish and strengthen the weakened system has made hundreds of cures in the most severe disorders.

Dr. Williams' Pink Pills for Pale People should be used in anaemia, chlorosis or green sickness, sick headache, nervousness and for a general run-down condition of the health.

Dr. Williams' Pink Pills are sold by all druggists, or will be sent, postpaid, on receipt of price, 50 cents per box; six boxes, $2.50, by the Dr. Williams Medicine Co., Schenectady, N. Y.

Nida of the Sea

By Molly MacMaster

(Copyright, 1912, by Associated Literary Press.)

Danvers first caught sight of her when she was going up the gangplank. Her grace was peculiarly her own, and it marked her even among the many charming women who were boarding the ocean liner. Her figure was willowy—the kind Danvers remembered having read of, but had seldom seen except among famous dancers.

It seemed, however, that the big man from the western world was not to look upon her again. She apparently had gone to her stateroom upon boarding the vessel and had remained there. It was the third day out before Danvers realized that only one chair remained unoccupied in the dining saloon, and that the place must be hers.

It was at dinner that he looked up from a desultory study of the menu card. She was sitting opposite him. Danvers knew with sudden conviction that if he ever loved a woman it would be one who could enter a dining room in just that way. There had been no rustling of draperies, no patter of French heels.

But to be frank with himself Danvers had not thought of loving anyone. Perhaps he was a little afraid of women; perhaps it was that he had found them wanting.

And now, because the beautiful woman opposite him was not in the least interested in him or in anything else as far as he could see, Danvers wanted to know her. She, whether through feminine wiles or mere perversity responded but faintly to all advances made in her direction. Danvers felt his fighting blood rise. What right had a woman to suggest mystery and thus lure masculine interest? He watched her covertly and once or twice their eyes met. There was veiled challenge in hers, determination in his, and the something in each that admitted attraction, one for the other.

And under the current of passing thoughts Danvers knew that the oval face of the woman had once before gone before his vision. Where he had seen her and when, he could not remember. He recalled it only as a spirit face without the crimson of the lips or the flush that lingered beneath her eyes.

"'You Will Go Back.'"

After dinner when all of the passengers came up on deck for the usual badinage and glimpse of the setting sun Danvers paced slowly back and forth, back and forth. He was conscious only of the fact that as each person stepped out from the companionway he was disappointed. Then she came and Danvers knew that he had been waiting for her.

She cast a swift glance at him, then turned in the opposite direction and paced slowly down the great length of deck.

Danvers waited until she would have to pass him on the narrowest part of the deck. As she came toward him he knew that she was going to attempt to pass him without raising her eyes.

"You are a most unsociable person, and do not take advantage of shipboard unconventionality," he said, and swung into step with her.

A smile came swiftly into her eyes. "Am I? I have no intention of being so."

"I think it is deliberate," Danvers said. "When you came out of the door a moment ago your veil blew across my face, and you did not even say you were sorry."

"Perhaps I was not," she glanced beneath her lashes, "and besides—I did not know that my veil had been taking liberties."

Danvers waited a long time before he spoke again. He noticed, with some irritation that she had tucked the chiffon veil well within her coat.

"They were prettier floating in the breeze," he said somewhat testily.

"I did not want to annoy you," she laughed back at him.

Danvers turned and looked straight at her.

"You are annoying me more and more every moment I am with you," he told her with a half laugh. "Four days ago I saw you come up the gangplank and I knew that I had seen you before. For four days and four nights your face has danced before me in maddening persistency, and I cannot recall where I—what is it?" he broke in abruptly. "Are you ill?"

She had gone a trifle white and her eyes had darkened. She smiled, but it was a far away smile.

"No—I am only unhappy," she said. "If you do not mind I will go below. Good night."

Danvers could only frown his disapproval of her leaving him to his own reflections and a lonely walk on deck.

The next morning she was more than ever reserved. A cool nod was all that greeted Danvers, and she seemed to have drawn completely within her shell. He knew that she was still unhappy. Her dark eyes were brooding, and her proud head drooped.

"Five days and my breakfast is tasteless because a woman does not smile." Danvers smiled whimsically at his own plight then leaned across the table toward her:

"Tomorrow we reach Fishguard—and I do not even know your name." His eyes held her gaze and she colored.

"It is scarcely worth while learning a name merely for one day," she answered quickly.

"But it is not for one day," Danvers told her. "I want to know where you are going—so that I may follow."

The girl caught a swift breath, then laughed unsteadily. She had never before been wooed in so masterful a way.

"But I am the follower." A sparkle of fire had kindled in her eyes. "A career is just ahead of me, and I am running after it." She arose from the table with a laugh and left him.

Danvers' teeth came together with a jerk. A moment later he, too, left the dining saloon. His shoulders were braced and his step firm. He would not look again at the woman who had refused him her name. At least, he would try not to.

When he went up to the writing room to get his mail off for Queenstown she was there writing. Danvers seated himself to wait for a desk. She was the first to finish writing, and he took the seat she had vacated. He did not look at her, but he knew that she was surprised and—yes, hurt.

It was not easy to write letters when his whole mind was rushing after the girl. He glanced down at the desk and began absently to trace the name left backward on the blotter.

"Nida," he read, and with the name his memory shot back some months. Danvers did not at first realize that the name he had traced was that of the woman whose identity troubled him. Her face floated before him and coupled itself with that name. Suddenly the story came to him. She was the famous dancer who had been the innocent cause of a great society scandal. Danvers remembered now having seen her picture in the western papers.

Without apparent reason he scratched the name from the blotter and went in search of her.

She was far up toward the bow of the boat standing in the full sweep of wind. Danvers went to her and stood close beside her so that she could not escape.

"Do you imagine for one instant that I would care any the less for you because of that?" he asked without preface.

"I have been trying to escape it for months," she said with a catch in her voice. "It follows me everywhere. I am never going back to New York." she added, "because I cannot stand it." She looked far back where, across the great expanse of water, her own country beckoned her. Danvers saw the sorrow in her eyes.

"Yes," he said in a low voice that seemed to turn the great ship about by the force of its appeal, "you will go back."

Hints About Steel.

To clean articles made of steel, rub with a piece of raw potato, unslaked lime or powdered pumice. Skates, sled runners, etc., may be prevented from rusting, when they are stored away for the summer, by coating them with a mixture of lard, pulverized black lead and camphor.

To remove rust from steel, rub with salt wet with hot vinegar; scour and rinse with boiling water.

Dry with a clean flannel cloth and polish with sweet oil.

Chin Vegetal.

Vegetable fibre, or chin vegetal, is made from leaves of a dwarf palm (Chamaerops humilis), which clings to the soil tenaciously. Its presence was a serious obstacle to the pioneers of Algerian colonization, and it had to be fought foot by foot. It was not then known that the plant would become a source of wealth to the colony and that it would be more and more sought as a commercial product.

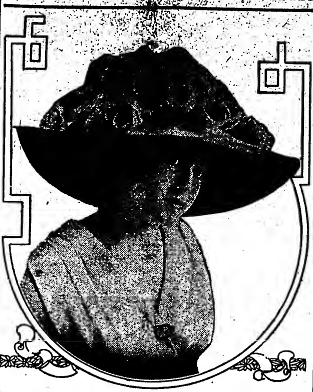
Lovely Moonlight Rose of White or Silver Gauze



THE last rose of summer to bloom in the millinery garden is the most beautiful of all. A dream of rose, a lovely ghost of all the bright colored beauties which have preceded her. This is the rose of white or silver gauze, made of the fabric folded over and wrapped about a rose center in the semblance of a full blown rose.

In the illustration a hat (which a French woman would be sure to call "ravishing") is shown trimmed with a wreath of gauze roses and delicate grasses. The hat is a fine dead-white chip faced with moire in pale silver gray. Besides the wreath of roses, a very full bow of white ribbon partially covers the crown, in the trimming. It is an adorable hat, beautiful in every detail. Nothing could be better for midsummer, or any other season, providing the body of the hat is chosen of a material suited to the time of year in which it is to be worn.

Other roses branched into wreaths and bouquets, are made of lightweight ribbons in odd colors. Very high luster in the ribbons makes these ribbon roses unusually effective and attractive. They are used on mid-season hats of lace and embroidery and on the net and lace caps which are worn indoors and out.

Tiny tightly folded roses continue to grow in favor, worn like a bar pin at the throat, over small bows, and jabots. They are made of all the most popular of the summer colors, blue, pink, green, lavender, pale yellow and white

A black satin girdle outlines the front of the blouse, and it runs into a narrow pointed panel for eight inches below the waist. This panel is part of the skirt.

PANIERS AN EARLY FANCY

Cannot Be Said to Have Achieved Much Success Despite Its Parisian Origin and Backing.

Numberless are the "robes de style" just now being shown in all the big dressmaking houses, says the Paris correspondent of Dress, and various are the forms they take. Of course the panier dress is one of them, copied exactly from old documents. But one never knows whether early models will be a success until La Parisienne has pronounced her opinion of them. Thus it is pretty safe to predict, instead of the panier dress, a return or a partial return to the directoire style. The high directoire collar and fancy vest are already seen at fashionable assemblies, worn with the cutaway habit coat and wide cuffs of the period. the directoire hat is worn with this costume, but the directoire hat is not new to us, for we have had it with us all the winter.

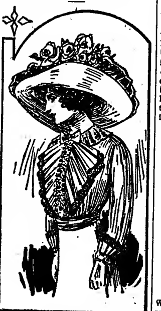
Tinted Walls.

It is far cheaper to tint walls with water or "size colors" than it is to paint them with oils. Moreover, the colors are lovely and the finish soft. The only difficulty lies in the fact that tinted walls cannot be washed. Size or fresco colors should never be touched with water. They may be cleaned with bread crumbs, or Indian meal, but the process is a tedious one. Dry pigments are used for this tinting. They are generally mixed in glue size that has been dissolved in hot water. They cost about fifty-five cents a package and one package will cover about forty square yards.—Harper's Bazar.

Crash Motor Coats.

The newest coats for motoring are made of heavy plain colored crash, lined with flowered crash, and the trimming of grill work and fabric-covered buttons. The flower effects in the linings are bold and the coloring brilliant.

OF MOUSSELINE DE SOIE.



This model is of mousseline de soie, but can be made of any other material. It is gathered or shirred at the shoulders and finished in front with a band of lace and buttons, on each side of which is a wide, graduated frill, bordered with heavy lace.

The collarette is of fine lace, the cravat and girdle are of satin. The sleeves are finished with odd-turned back frills of the material, edged with the heavy lace.

Fancy Vests in Favor.

A number of the smartest suits now being made up show fancy vests, says the Dry Goods Economist. These are occasionally made separately, so that the suit can be worn with or without them, but the majority are attached to the coat, and it is expected that the latter style will be made popular than the separate vests. These vests are made of satin, broadcloth, velvet, moire, faille, brocade and other fancy silks. Some of the more elaborate are beautifully embroidered in the new Oriental colorings or in blending colors to match the garment.

Lace and the Reticule.

Handbags made of lace are a pretty summer possession that will take the fancy of the lover of dainty dress accessories. They are swung from long cords and are to be worn with the lingerie frock. Irish and Venise, both real and imitation, compose them, as well as black and white Chantilly, and filet combined with embroidery.

Waists Have Pockets.

Sporting waists for tennis, golf, etc., come in white or natural colors, butcher's linen, with big pockets, belts and collars and cuffs made of plain or striped material. There are, of course, the usual hip pockets and silk ties.

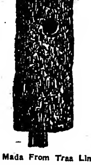
FARM and GARDEN

ERECTING HOMES FOR BIRDS

Lovers of Songsters in All Parts of Country Are Urging Protection for Feathered Tribe.

Lovers of birds in every part of our land and also the United States department of agriculture are urging people everywhere to do everything in their power to attract and protect our native song birds.

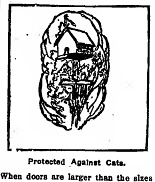
In winter this may be accomplished by feeding the birds when the land is covered with ice and snow. In spring people are urged to put up nesting boxes where the birds may make their homes and rear their young. In summer these little feathered neighbors need human protection to shield their young from the attacks of cats.



Nest Made From Tree Limbs.

Are you going to join the ranks of the bird protectors of this land? If you are now is the time to show your loyalty to your feathered friends. Make some nesting houses and get them up at once. The song birds are worth protecting and should be provided with places to build their homes. It isn't difficult to make nesting boxes. Once the birds have discovered them they will begin to collect material with which to line them and make them soft and "comfey" for their families.

Any small wooden box may be converted into a house. Use thin, smooth boards for the roof. Place a board beneath the house to keep the cats from climbing up to the birds' home. A good house is made by hollowing out a large tree limb and cutting a hole in it for a doorway. For blue birds make the entrance hole about the size of a quarter. If the box is intended for wrens make it smaller.



Protected Against Cats.

When doors are larger than the sizes mentioned sparrows are apt to inhabit them. Blue birds are among the most desirable tenants and they have been known to utilize as houses tin cans, old shoes, large funnels, or any other receptacle that is nailed securely to a post or wall.

How to Use Feed Roller.

Never use a roller immediately after a heavy rain. But it should be used as soon as the surface becomes dry enough to pulverize easily without packing tightly. The roller should be used in dry seasons following the harrow to keep the moisture in the soil. Of course it is not possible to use the roller to any extent after plants are well up but it can always be used to great advantage in the preparation of the seed bed. Very often one rolling will not mash all the clods and if the ground is particularly rough it should be harrowed and rolled and harrowed again until the soil is thoroughly pulverized.

Staking Tomatoes.

This is a comparatively new practice, but it is working out fine, and even market gardeners are adopting it on a large scale. Up to recently its chief use was by village people in their small backyard gardens, but is now used by growers who are supplying a No. 1 trade. Its advantages are that more tomato plants can be grown on a given area; they can be started earlier because they can be easily protected in case of a danger from frost and that more and better tomatoes can be grown on the plants.

Fence-Post Problem.

Cement will solve the fence-post problem for those who have a gravel pit nearby. It would almost seem that, with concrete posts and woven wire a fence could be built that would be as permanent as the farm itself.

CULTURE OF THE ASPARAGUS

Excellent Remedy for Killing Off Green Slugs Is to Dust Daily With Air-Slaked Lime.

Stop cutting asparagus when peas are fit to gather. Let the tops grow until fall. Keep the weeds down by applying a thick mulch of coarse manure, rotted leaves or grass. If the little fly appears, dust early in the morning with dry air-slacked lime. Paris green solution may be used instead of lime. We have always found the lime effective if put on as soon as the slugs appear. Use fresh air-slacked lime and dust every morning until all the worms are killed. Asparagus grown from seed must be kept clean of grass and weeds, and the soil mellow and rich. Use diluted urine from the stables, or bone phosphate, one handful to every 40 inches of row, says a writer in an exchange. The best remedy for asparagus rust is to cut the tops off close to the ground and burn. Then sow a thick coat of air-slacked lime over the rows and give clean culture. All rust stalks should be gathered up and burnt. If any are left the spores will be blown by the wind on to the new growth. To grow stout plants from seed, thin out the plants to stand four inches apart in the row.

KILL OFF INJURIOUS WEEDS

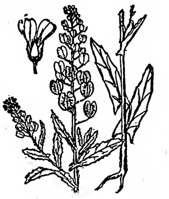
If Noxious Plants Are to Be Destroyed Work Must Be Done in Thorough Manner.

(By R. G. WEATHERSTONE.)

The presence of weeds on many farms demands that more rigorous measures be taken for their destruction. It is plain that so long as so few pastures, meadows and cultivated crops are used in rotation with grain the farmers will find it very difficult to keep the weeds in check.

Summer fallowing may destroy weeds, but it requires a great deal of labor during the entire season, when no crop is obtained from it.

Mustard, wild oats, pigeon grass, and French weed are among the worst weeds with which farmers have to contend.



The French Weed.

It is to be regretted that so far as the writer knows, no simple or practical method has been found that will surely and completely eradicate French weed. Some farmers have reported methods that have proved successful with them, but other farmers have tried the same methods and failed.

Some few things have been learned by experiments, however. If this weed is to be destroyed, the work must be done thoroughly. The weed produces seeds so profusely that if one plant is allowed to go to seed a large area of surrounding land will soon be infested.

If there is one direction in farming in which thoroughness is required, it is in trying to destroy this weed. A slipshod way will not do, and an ounce of prevention is worth a thousand pounds of cure. Farmers whose farms are free from the French weed should guard against its incoming with the utmost vigilance and care.

GARDEN and FARM NOTES

Cut the rye heads out of the wheat.

Keep the cucumbers picked off each day.

An inverted clover soil is ideal for beans.

If your onions are running to tops, break down the tops.

Kerosene emulsion is good—or bad—for squash bugs.

Keep the tomato vines off the ground, on supports of some kind.

The first essential in fighting weeds in any crop is to keep ahead of them.

There is permanent satisfaction in the use of concrete equipment on the farm.

A common rotation for large bean-growing sections is clover, beans, wheat.

The small hand-cultivator is handy and saves much hoe work in every garden.

Experiments have proved that beans yield better on old land than on new.

Hay will be valuable again this year. Let none go to waste; mow every corner.

Be sure that rain-water barrels and cisterns are closely screened to keep out the mother mosquitoes.

The longer you stick to the cultivator between the corn rows the more corn you will have in the crib by and by.

For cabbage worms use insect powder mixed with flour in the proportion of 1 pound of powder to 25 of flour. Dust the plants well after each rain.

Nelson Likely To Run.

Geo. F. Authier, the Minneapolis Tribune political scout, has the following to say regarding Senator Nelson's prospective candidacy for another term, the item indicating that the writer has received "inside" information on the subject:

"Senator Knute Nelson will be a candidate to succeed himself. He will file for the nomination under the Keefe bill sometime the last of the month. This is not an authoritative statement but is looked upon as nearly so certain that the political gossip is already beginning to consider the possible effect of this action. Senator Nelson is known to have been carefully considering the situation for some time. He is averse, at his age, to make a scramble for the office He has been advised that his nomination is almost certain —as certain as anything can be in politics, and according to the rumor that is current has practically made up his mind to file. It is unlikely the senator will indulge in a campaign fight for the nomination. He will make speeches, probably, but they will deal in broader general principles and are not likely to go into personalities unless he is too bitterly attacked."—Thirteen Towns

Senator Nelson will not have to make much of a scramble to be reelected as the people will attend to his campaign. About the only question they will ask is; do you think you can give us another as good term of service as you have given us in the past? And when Knute says yes he can go home to Alexandria and rest up, and the people will do the rest.

The time has passed when one man can slide into office on the tail of another man's coat. We understand that the Taft administration are pleased to have men like Knute Nelson and Steenerson as candidates to strengthen their ticket. Nelson can not get many votes for Taft, in this state, but he will get the votes for himself. Or to make matters plain, the people know who has rendered them honest service and who has not. The Republican farmers of Minnesota drew the line, on Reciprocity and they are not going to turn down men that made as bitter a fight against it as Senator Nelson and Steenerson did, and they will not vote for a man that tried to ram it down their throats by the methods adopted by Taft. Put these facts in your pipe and smoke them for they are facts.

Senator Nelson pays about as much attention to the call of James A. Peterson his opponent for renomination as he would to the barking of an Indian dog. If Peterson wants to get Knute stirred up he wants to get some home steaders to write him that he is about to loose his homestead by some ruling of the Department of the Interior. Then he will hear from Knute.

We shall take up the question of the nomination of county officials for this county before the primary election next month, and if we know any good reason why any candidate should not be nominated we will not hesitate to say so as The Sunbeam will not be "gagged."

E. T. Young who rendered the state such good service as Attorney General is a Progressive candidate for the Republican nomination for governor.

LaFollette is not making any friends in Minnesota by his bitter attacts on Roosevelt, infact it looks to us as if he was placing himself in the has been list. It is not pleasant to have a man like him trying to tear down, at a time when the republicans of this state are trying to recover from the party calamity at Chicago.

FOR COUNTY TREASURER.

I wish to announce that I am a candidate for County Treasurer, subject to the ratification of the Republican voters at the primaries, September 17, 1912 Being that political parties have always regarded it as important to have their members elected to all offices, it must be for aid in promoting party policies, for so far as the work in the county offices is concerned, it can make no difference whatever, what the officer's political affiliations [illegible] must be that [illegible] to maintain the average of [illegible] While the price-level does not prove that times are good, theoretically, yet we know that with the enormous debt of the country, it will be harder to pay it with low prices than with high, steady prices. I believe that because one can not support the whole Republican ticket, it is no reason at all to quite supporting candidates for congress and the legislature, which is by far more important than the office of president, so far as party politics is concerned. Sincerely for the success of the party.

Old "Ninety-Seven"

Every day at just such an hour the old man entered the yard and walked slowly up and down among the engines, lingering longest around old "97," the huge, high-smoke-stacked locomotive, still on duty, but soon to be retired and devoted to a most inglorious end by means of a sham collision.

A few of the blue-jeaned heroes around the depot objected more or less vigorously to the presence of the stranger, for it is a dangerous place for the nimble and quick-eyed, and the old man was half blind, and his ears were closed to even the shrill whistle of the trains. But some of the men remembered that the bent and feeble veteran was an old engineer, the oldest on the road, and "97" had been for years dearer to him than wife, or child, or friend.

Al Reece had kept his post until five years before, carefully concealing from the argus-eyed inspectors the fact of his partial blindness and infirmity. He had been an engineer for 50 years. It is a matter of history that he took the first train over the road, and "97" was his second love. The first he had gone over a bridge with, after feeling her heart beats quiver through his own breast and feeling her response to his every desire for 20 years.

It's a strange thing how a man gets to love a creature of iron and steel. There wasn't an engine along the division kept in better shape than "97." New styles were adopted, and all the late inventions came in, but the "old girl" kept her place, and Al Reece kept her in it by his care.

The old-fashioned brass mountings were as bright as the day they were fitted on, and there wasn't a speck or a bit of dust about her anywhere.

But as time passed on the men began to look half pityingly at the old engineer and whisper that perhaps he would have to be retired before "97" was called in.

"Why, he can't see a foot in front of him," said one of the young fellows, "and it's a mighty risk to let a blind man run an engine!"

The same thought was moving the directors, for they could no longer ignore the fact of his condition. But those who believe corporations have no souls might have learned much if they had witnessed the scene in the superintendent's office when old Al Reece was pensioned and discharged.

The news had been broken to him by a man who looked at the bowed figure with misty tears and at the conclusion of the interview had taken the toil-worn hand, that had held the lever for so many years, in his own as a son might have done.

The old engineer lifted his eyes, full of the piteous look the blind have, to his face.

"My trip's about over, anyway," he said, "an' I don't want to slow up at the terminal on old '97.' But it's all right, sir, it's all right. I might have had some accident on account of my eyes an' have carried off the folks that wan't ready for the last station. But I don't believe I would. I really didn't need to see with her. She was eyes for me; and she had too much sense to go wrong.

"There's just one favor I want to ask, sir: Have 'em let me though the gates whenever she's in from her trips. It'll be a comfort to us both, sir."

For a long time, the engine, under a strong, young hand, kept her regular runs. But she got fractious and cranky, and was finally used only in the yards. Old Al never missed his visit to her, though he grew feebler all the time, and seemed to mourn over her changed and neglected appearance.

One day as he leaned against her full sides, patting her and talking of the days they had passed together, a young switchman, new in the yards and ignorant, stepped up to him.

"This is the last day for old '97,'" he called into the dull ears. "Some showmen have bought her, an' they're going to take her down on the siding an' run her off the upper bridge. Two trainloads comin' from Newton to see it. And there'll be fireworks and a great sight."

The old man put his hand to his throat and leaned more heavily against the condemned engine. The young fellow continued:

"Better be here. It'll be a big show. She'll have steam up an' be sent wild. Starts at nine, if it's pretty dark."

He went whistling away to set the switch for the eight o'clock flyer, and the old engineer was left alone. But a flush was on the furrowed face, and the dim eyes burned with a strange light.

"She's ready now," said the director an hour later to a group of trainmen, who had been stoking up the old engine, and hanging her sides with gayly covered banners. "This is her last trip, let her go!"

He threw the throttle wide, and as the engine bounded with a mighty leap toward the grade's incline leaped onto the ground. A great crowd gathered along the siding greeting the wild engine with a cheer, which speedily turned into a yell of horror; for as the panting thing madly rushed toward the bridge they saw a figure on the right-hand seat; and as the glow from the furnace lighted the cab with its [illegible] of the old engineer [illegible]

SYNOPSIS.

Lieut. Harry Mallory is ordered to the Philippines. He and Marjorie Newton decide to elope, but wreck of taxicab prevents their seeing minister on the way to the train. Transcontinental train is taking on passengers. Porter has a lively time with an Englishman and Ira Lathrop, a Yankee business man. The elopers have an exciting time getting to the train. "Little Jimmie" Wellington, bound for Reno to get a divorce, boards train in maudlin condition. Later Mrs. Jimmie appears. She is also bound for Reno with same object. Likewise Mrs. Sammy Whitcomb. Latter blames Mrs. Jimmie for her marital troubles. Classmates of Mallory decorate bridal berth. Rev. and Mrs. Temple start on a vacation. They decide to cut loose and Temple removes evidence of his calling. Marjorie decides to let Mallory proceed alone, but train starts while they are lost in farewell.

CHAPTER IX.

All Aboard!

The starting of the train surprised the ironical decorators in the last stages of their work. Their smiles died out in a sudden shame, as it came over them that the joke had recoiled on their own heads. They had done their best to carry out the time-honored rite of making a newly married couple as miserable as possible—and the newly married couple had failed to do its share.

The two lieutenants glared at each other in mutual contempt. They had studied much at West Point about ambushes, and how to avoid them. Could Mallory have escaped the pit they had digged for him? They looked at their handiwork in disgust. The cosy-corner effect of white ribbons and orange flowers, gracefully masking the concealed rice-trap, had seemed the wittiest thing ever devised. Now it looked the silliest.

The other passengers were equally downcast. Meanwhile the two lovers in the corridor were kissing good-byes as if they were hoping to store up honey enough to sustain their hearts for a three years' fast. And the porter was studying them with perplexity.

He was used, however, to waking people out of dreamland, and he began to fear that if he were discovered spying on the lovers, he might suffer. So he coughed discreetly three or four times.

Since the increasing racket of the train made no effect on the two hearts beating as one, the small matter of a cough was as nothing.

Finally the porter was compelled to reach forward and tap Mallory's arm, and stutter:

"'Scuse me, but co-could I git b-hy?"

The embrace was untied, and the lovers stared at him with a dazed, where-am-I? look. Marjorie was the first to realize what awakened them. She felt called upon to say something, so she said, as carelessly as if she had not just emerged from a young gentleman's arms:

"Oh, porter, how long before the train starts?"

"Train's done started, Missy."

This simple statement struck the wool from her eyes and the cotton from her ears, and she was wide enough awake when she cried: "Oh, stop it—stop it!"

"That's mo'n I can do, Missy," the porter expostulated.

"Then I'll jump off," Marjorie vowed, making a dash for the door.

But the porter filled the narrow path, and waved her back.

"Vestibuln's done locked up—train's going lickety-split." Feeling that he had safely checkmated any rashness, the porter squeezed past the dumbfounded pair, and went to change his blue blouse for the white coat of his chambermaidenly duties.

Mallory's first wondering thought was a rapturous feeling that circumstances had forced his dream into a reality. He thrilled with triumph: "You've got to go with me now."

"Yes—I've got to go," Marjorie assented meekly; "then, sublimely, "It's fate. Kismet!"

They clutched each other again in a fiercely blissful hug. Marjorie came back to earth with a bump: "Are you really sure there's a minister on board?"

"Pretty sure," said Mallory, sobering a trifle.

"But you said you were sure?"

"Well, when you say you're sure, that means you're not quite sure."

It was not an entirely satisfactory justification, and Marjorie began to quake with alarm: "Suppose there shouldn't be?"

"Oh, then," Mallory answered carelessly, "there's bound to be one tomorrow."

Marjorie realized at once the enormous abyss between then and the morrow, and she gasped: "Tomorrow! And no chaperon! Oh, I'll jump out of the window."

Mallory could prevent that, but when she pleaded, "What shall we do?" he had no solution to offer. Again it was she who received the first inspiration.

"I have it," she beamed.

"Yes, Marjorie?" he assented, dubiously.

"We'll pretend not to be married at all."

He seized the rescuing ladder: "That's it! Not married—just friends."

"Till we can get married—"

"Yes, and then we can stop being friends."

"My love—my friend!" They embraced in a most unfriendly manner.

An impatient yelp from the neglected dog-basket awoke them.

"Oh, Lord, we've brought Snoozleums."

"Of course we have." She took the dog from the prison, tucked him under her arm, and tried to compose her bridal face into a merely friendly countenance before they entered the car. But she must pause for one more kiss, one more of those bitter-sweet good-byes. And Mallory was nothing loath.

Hudson and Shaw were still glumly perplexed, when the porter returned in his white jacket.

"I bet they missed the train; all this work for nothing," Hudson grumbled. But Shaw, seeing the porter, caught a gleam of hope, and asked anxiously:

"Say, porter, have you seen anything anywhere that looks like a freshly merried pair?"

"Well," and the porter rubbed his eyes with the back of his hand as he chuckled, "well, they's a mighty lovle' couple out theah in the corridor."

"That's them—they—it!"

Instantly everything was alive and in action. It was as if a bugle had shrilled in a dejected camp.

"Get ready!" Shaw commanded. "Here's rice for everybody."

"Everybody take an old shoe," said Hudson. "You can't miss in this narrow car."

"There's a kazoo for everyone, too," said Shaw, as the outstretched hands were equipped with wedding ammunition. "Do you know the 'Wedding March'?"

"I ought to by this time," said Mrs. Whitcomb.

Right into the tangle of preparation, old Ira Lathrop stalked, on his way back to his seat to get more cigars.

"Have some rice for the bridal couple?" said Ashton, offering him of his own double-handful.

But Lathrop brushed him aside with a romance-hater's growl.

"Watch out for your head, then," cried Hudson, and Lathrop ducked just too late to escape a neck-filling, hair-filling shower. An old shoe took him a clip abaft the ear, and the old woman-hater dropped raging into the same berth where the spinster, Anne Gattin, was trying to dodge the same downpour.

Still there was enough of the shrapnel left to overwhelm the two young "friends," who marched into the aisle, trying to look indifferent and prepared for nothing on earth less than for a wedding charivari.

Mallory should have done better than to entrust his plans to fellows like Hudson and Shaw, whom he had known at West Point for diabolically joyous hazers and practical jokers. Even as he sputtered rice and winced from the impact of flying footgear, he was cursing himself as a double-dyed idiot for asking such men to engage his berth for him. He had a sudden instinct that they had doubtless bedecked his trunk and Marjorie's with white satin furbelows and ludicrous labels. But he could not shelter himself from the white sleet and the black thumps. He could hardly shelter Marjorie, who cowered behind him and shrieked even louder than the romping tormentors.

When the assailants had exhausted the rice and shoes, they charged down the aisle for the privilege of kissing the bride. Mallory was dragged and bunted and shunted here and there, and he had to fight his way back to Marjorie with might and main. He was tugging and striking like a demon, and yelling, "Stop it! stop it!"

Hudson took his punishment with uproarious good nature, laughing:

"Oh, shut up, or we'll kiss you!"

But Shaw was scrubbing his wry lips with a seasick wail of:

"Wow! I think I kissed the dog."

There was, of necessity, some pause for breath, and the combatants draped themselves limply about the seats. Mallory glared at the twin Benedict Arnolds and demanded:

"Are you two thugs going to San Francisco with me?"

"Don't worry," smiled Hudson, "we're only going as far as Kedzie avenue, just to start the honeymoon properly."

If either of the elopers had been calmer, the solution of the problem would have been simple. Marjorie could get off at this suburban station and drive home from there. But their wits were like pied type, and they were further jumbled, when Shaw broke in with a sudden: "Come, see the little dove-cote we fixed for you."

Before they knew it, they were both haled along the aisle to the white satin atrocity. "Love in a bungalow," said Hudson. "Sit down—make yourselves perfectly at home."

"No—never—oh, oh, oh!" cried Marjorie, darting away and throwing herself into the first empty seat—Ira Lathrop's berth. Mallory followed to console her with caresses and murmurs of, "There, there, don't cry, dearie!"

Hudson and Shaw followed close with mawkish mockery: "Don't cry, dearie."

And now Mrs. Temple intervened. She had enjoyed the initiation ceremony as well as anyone. But when the little bride began to cry, she remembered the pitiful terror and shy shame she had undergone [illegible] wife, and she [illegible] side, brushing [illegible] gnats.

"You poor thing," she comforted. "Come, my child, lean on me, and have a good cry."

Hudson grinned, and put out his own arms: "She can lean on me, if she'd rather."

Mrs. Temple glanced up with indignant rebuke: "Her mother is far away, and she wants a mother's breast to weep on. Here's mine, my dear."

The impudent Shaw tapped his own military chest: "She can use mine."

Infuriated at this bride-baiting, Mallory rose and confronted the two imps with clenched fists: "You're a pretty pair of friends, you are!"

The imperturbable Shaw put out a pair of tickets as his only defense: "Here are your tickets, old boy."

And Hudson roared jovially: "We tried to get you a stateroom, but it was gone."

"And here are your baggage checks," laughed Shaw, forcing into his fists a few pasteboards. "We got your trunks on the train ahead, all right. Don't mention it—you're entirely welcome."

It was the porter that brought the first relief from the ordeal.

"If you gemmen is gettin' off at Kedzie avenue, you'd better step smart. We're slowin' up now."

Marjorie was sobbing too audibly to hear, and Mallory swearing too inaudibly to heed the opportunity Kedzie avenue offered. And Hudson was yelling: "Well, good-bye, old boy and old girl. Sorry we can't go all the way." He had the effrontery to try to kiss the bride good-bye, and Shaw was equally bold, but Mallory's fury enabled him to beat them off. He elbowed and shouldered them down the aisle, and sent after them one of his own shoes. But it just missed Shaw's flying coattails.

Mallory stood glaring after the departing traitors. He was glad that they at least were gone, till he realized with a sickening slump in his vitals, that they had not taken with them his awful dilemma. And now the train was once more clickety-clicking into the night and the west.

CHAPTER X.

Excess Baggage.

Never was a young soldier so stumped by a problem in tactics as Lieutenant Harry Mallory, safely aboard his train, and not daring to leave it, yet hopelessly unaware of how he was to dispose of his lovely but unlabelled baggage.

Hudson and Shaw had erected a white satin temple to Hymen in berth number one, had created such commotion, and departed in such confusion that there had been no opportunity to proclaim that he and Marjorie were "not married—just friends."

And now the passengers had accepted them as that enormous fund of amusement to any train, a newly wedded pair. To explain the mistake would have been difficult, even among friends. But among strangers—well, perhaps a wiser and a colder brain than Harry Mallory's could have stood there and delivered a brief oration restoring truth to her pedestal. But Mallory was in no condition for such a stoic delivery.

He mopped his brow in agony, lost in a blizzard of bewilderment. He drifted back toward Marjorie, half to protect and half for companionship. He found Mrs. Temple cuddling her close and mothering her as if she were a baby instead of a bride.

"Did the poor child run away and get married?"

Marjorie's frantic "Boo-hoo-hoo" might have meant anything. Mrs. Temple took it for assent, and murmured with glowing reminiscence:

"Just the way Doctor Temple and I did."

She could not see the leaping flash of wild hope that lighted up Mallory's face. She only heard his voice across her shoulder:

"Doctor? Doctor Temple? Is your husband a reverend doctor?"

"A reverend doctor?" the little old lady repeated weakly.

"Yes—a—a preacher?"

The poor old congregation-weary soul was abruptly confronted with the ruination of all the delight in her little escapade with her pulpit-fagged husband. If she had ever dreamed that the girl who was weeping in her arms was weeping from any other fright than the usual fright of young brides, fresh from the preacher's benediction, she would have cast every other consideration aside, and told the truth.

But her husband's last behest before he left her had been to keep their precious pretend-secret. She felt—just then—that a woman's first duty is to obey her husband. Besides, what business was it of this young husband's what her old husband's business was? Before she had fairly begun to debate her duty, almost automatically, with the instantaneous instinct of self-protection, her lips had uttered the denial:

"Oh—he's—just a—plain doctor. There he is now."

Mallory cast one miserable glance down the aisle at Dr. Temple coming back from the smoking room. As the old man paused to stare at the bridal berth, whose preparation he had not seen, he was just enough befuddled by his first cigar for thirty years to look a trifle tipsy. The motion of the train and the rakish tilt of his unwonted crimson tie confirmed the suspicion and annihilated Mallory's new-born hope, that perhaps repentant fate had dropped a parson at their very feet.

(TO BE CONTINUED.)

The hardest thing a doctor has to do is to cure a woman who has nothing the matter with her.

ONE ESCAPES PLOT

FLIGHT OF TWO OTHER SLAYERS AND FOURTH PRISONER FOILED BY ATTENDANT.

WOMAN BROUGHT TOOLS

Wife of Inmate Said to Have Done This—Steel Bars Cut Through in Readiness for Wholesale Delivery.

St. Peter.—What proved a partially successful jail delivery was carried out at the St. Peter state hospital for the criminal insane. One prisoner escaped, and only the vigilance of an attendant prevented three others from following him to liberty.

Bjorn Osthy, patricide, lowered himself from one of the grated windows in the second story of the building and disappeared into the woods. In doing so he unwittingly exposed a plot which would have given freedom to two other murderers, James Cunningham and George Parker, and to a fourth prisoner Andrew Sweider.

Great cunning was shown by James Cunningham, the leader of the quartet, in planning and executing the coup. Craftily concealing his scheme from all the prisoners but his four confederates, and using only the crudest kind of tools, Cunningham sawed a steel bar from one window and was nearly ready to remove another from a second. He was completing his work when his escape was prevented by the clumsiness of Osthy.

Cunningham, believed by the hospital authorities to have furnished the brains of the plot, is a burly negro, and is known as a dangerous and desperate criminal. He was sent to the Stillwater penitentiary from Hennepin county for the crime of burglary, and while confined in state's prison stabbed and killed a fellow prisoner. On the expiration of his original sentence he was tried for murder and sentenced to a term of life imprisonment. Subsequently he became demented and was brought here.

It is believed he began making preparations for the escape several months ago. He removed the steel shanks from a pair of shoes and fashioned one of them into a rude saw, with this saw, less than three inches in length, Cunningham severed the bars.

Another murderer, George Parker, was admitted to partnership, Cunningham drafting him to act as a sentry. Cunningham's method was to take a daily shower bath. The noise made by the water enabled him to work at the bar without fear of detection, and the attendants now recall that whenever anyone approached the washroom Parker began singing or whistling, doubtless signaling the other of the impending danger. Soap was rubbed into the cut made by the saw, and in time Cunningham cut through the bar in two pieces. Carefully restoring it to its proper position, he awaited an opportunity to escape.

Finding that he could not hope to escape in daylight, Cunningham directed his energies toward cutting through a bar in a window on the first floor, but at the opposite end of the building. It would appear that he grew impatient over the delay, and took in another accomplice, Andrew Sweider. Sweider is a petty criminal who was arrested last spring for breaking into a box car in the Minneapolis railway yards. He was sent to the reformatory at St. Cloud, and two weeks later was transferred to the hospital for the criminal insane.

His usefulness to the plotters lay in the fact that his wife had been allowed access to the building on a few occasions. When she was with her husband she was kept under close surveillance, but it is supposed that on one of her visits she managed to pass him a small file, which he turned over to Cunningham. The latter started to make another saw from the remaining piece of steel, and it was about two-thirds completed when the plot was discovered.

Osthy managed to descend from a window twenty-five feet from the ground with the aid of a sheet taken from his bed. Once on the ground, he gathered up the raiment of his companions, which he had thrown out, and carried it to a point about a hundred yards south of the building. It is probable that at least two trips were necessary, and on the last of these he was discovered by Albin Ecklun, an attendant.

Captain Ray T. Lewis Passes.

Duluth. — Word was received here that Captain Ray T. Lewis, a former mayor of Duluth and twice representing the Fiftieth district in the Minnesota legislature, is dead at Brunswick, Maine, at the age of 72. He has but lately returned from an extended trip abroad and planned to leave New England for Duluth August 10. He is survived by his son, Fred Lewis, a lumberman of New Orleans. Capt. Lewis was an expert navigator and sailed the clipper ships as a master from twenty-five to forty years ago.

CHARLES A. LINDBERGH

RUST SCARE IS DISSIPATED

FAVORABLE WEATHER ADVERSE TO THE INFECTION.

Good Report Received From Expert Who Visits Red River Valley.

Minneapolis.—A return of somewhat cooler temperatures over the Northwest grain fields is said to have dissipated the black rust scare that started Tuesday when samples of infected wheat were received from Amenia, N. D.

The weather is now against the spread of the disease and the clearing weather with sunshine will hasten the ripening of late wheat beyond the reach of this infection.

B. W. Snow, crop expert, made a hurried trip into the wheat fields as soon as the report of rust was received. He has wired from Fargo, N. D., that after an inspection trip around Moorhead, Minn., covering 45 miles he found no more black rust than could be found any year and far less than last year:

His message read, in part:

"At Comstock, Minn., in the wheat I examined may be found a few spots where there are rust pustules on the top sheaf of a few stalks, but hardly a sample where it was showing on the head straw. Heads in these fields are long well filled and the grain already in stiff dough.

"The earliest wheat is taking on color and cutting will begin next week. The wheat seen will average 22 to 25 bushels to the acre and the possibility of rust damage is too remote to be considered as a crop factor."

John Inglis, another crop expert, was on 'Change for a few minutes on his way to Fargo to pass on the rust-infested wheat. Mr. Inglis did not take the news as indicating any serious condition.

"From what I can gather in the report," said Mr. Inglis, "the rust discovered is a sporadic case. This is very usual and I firmly believe that is all that will be found in the Northwest this year. The crop in this section of the country is big and the chief feature confronting the county is sufficient labor to harvest it."

HOLD HARMONY FEAST.

Hennepin County Democrats Forget Factional Differences.

Minneapolis. — Harmony was the keynote of the dinner given by the Hennepin County Democratic club at the Commercial club. Leaders of Democracy from all parts of the state urged the "get-together" spirit. The followers of the "houn' dog" were importuned to forget their differences and come into the fold of a united Democracy. Daniel W. Lawler of St. Paul, candidate for United States senator; C. M. Andrist, candidate for governor, Einar Hoidale, Judge H. L. Buck of Winona, T. J. Knox of Jackson, John Jenswold of Duluth, Alderman W. E. Barr, C. W. Bibb, all showed the need of "burying the hatchet." William Jennings Bryan was the idol of the gathering.

Banker Hurt in Auto Mishap.

Red Wing. — Charles S. Sawyer, who is cashier at the First National Bank of Goodhue, probably was fatally injured in an automobile accident three miles from Goodhue village. His wife and three children were with him but escaped serious injury.

Tight Skirts Condemned.

Minneapolis.—Emilie Glorieux, who is the policewoman, says that young society women are responsible in great measure for the continued popularity of indecently tight clothes. "It is not to be wondered at that many girls who work in stores and factories wear improperly tight clothes when girls who should show good taste and more propriety in these things, since they have greater opportunities to acquire refinement, are the most flagrantly offensive in adopting extreme style," Miss Glorieux said.

GOV. ASKS MONEY

MR. EBERHART TO SEEK FUND TO PRESENT MINNESOTA AT PANAMA-PACIFIC FETE.

RESULT OF TENER VISIT

Cash to Fight Tuberculosis Also to Be Sought—Governor Tener Entertained and Tells of Pennsylvania's Plans.

St. Paul. — Governor Eberhart will ask the next legislature to appropriate money for a Minnesota building at the Panama-Pacific exposition at San Francisco in 1915 and to devote a considerable sum to the suppression of tuberculosis and the advancement of other policies for public health. This action was the partial result of a visit in St. Paul by Governor John K. Tener of Pennsylvania and 17 fellow commissioners, who were on their way home after selecting the site for the Pennsylvania building on the San Francisco fair grounds. The party were guests of the Association of Commerce during the four hours they were in St. Paul.

Governor Eberhart had a conference with Governor Tener. Mr. Eberhart, who has been making a special study of public health for the last few months, said that only state policies of health and taxation were discussed, Pennsylvania being well known for its sanitary projects.

"This is not a political trip," declared Governor Tener, in telling of the commission's trip to San Francisco, "and we have left that subject alone. I did not even inquire about public sentiment in regard to national politics while on the coast.

"Our business was to pick a site for Pennsylvania's $350,000 building at the Panama-Pacific exposition. We naturally think that Western people are always anxious to go East, but you have no idea how much we Easterners have wanted to see what the western coast can produce. The completion of the Panama canal will mark the culmination of four centuries of effort, and with such a basis as this the exposition, in my opinion, cannot fail to be a big success."

The two governors, Mayor F. B. McClain of Lancaster, Pa., T. B. Mills of Superior, Wis., recently elected grand exalted ruler of the Elks at Portland, and Louis Betz, vice president of the association of commerce, were the speakers at the dinner.

"Pennsylvania spends $2,500,000 annually in the state health department," said Governor Eberhart, "and Minnesota can learn much from her. I shall ask our next legislation to devote more money to the health of its citizens, especially in fighting tuberculosis."

GERMAN CHORUS PLEASE

Eighteen Hundred Voices Sing "Schatzerl Klein."

St. Paul. — A very fair-sized house heard the chorus of 1,800 voices, conducted by Theodore Kelbe, sing the "Schatzerl Klein" song in the St. Paul auditorium, as a part of the Saengerfest. The audience was enthralled with the chorus, which received much praise from Emil Oberhoffer, conductor of the Minneapolis Symphony orchestra. Marcus Kellerman, soloist of the day, was given a hearty ovation.

Gossip among the Saengerfolk indicated that Denver would be the place for meeting two years from now. Dubuque, Ia., would like the Saengerfest, but it is believed that there is no hall large enough there to accommodate the singers.

FORTY LIVES IMPERILED.

Oiled Waste Aflame on Stairway of Rooming House in Duluth.

Duluth.—What looks like an attempt to burn a house in which 40 men were sleeping was frustrated by Policeman Paradise, who found a large pile of oiled waste burning on the stairway of the house. With the assistance of the occupants, whom he awakened he managed to put out the flames before any serious damage resulted.

Minnesota Dairymen Prosper.

Minneapolis. — Thrifty dairy farmers of Minnesota received the great total of $25,714,235.64 for butter fat in 1910, an increase of 33⅓ per cent in two years. In 1908 the fact that the money received by farmers of the state for butter fat had mounted to $18,500,000, coupled with the prediction that the $20,000,000 total would be reached within eighteen months thereafter, was considered a wonderful reflection of the growth of dairy farming. With the total as shown in the report, only slightly under $25,000,000 for 1910, the increase is found to have exceeded all expectation.

Range Power Plant Involved.

Duluth. — Under the findings of Judge Page Morris, in chancery proceedings in the federal court in the case against the Range Power company of Chisholm, Minn., in which the Central Trust company of Illinois as trustee in complaint, the property and franchises of the Range Power company will be sold August 28, 1912, and the proceeds used to pay $65,000 worth of bonds that the company issued, together with accrued interest, and $80,000.

AFTER WILD SHEEP in CENTRAL ASIA

BY TA WEI TI

HASSACK, OVIS and KALMUK HUNTER

SOME OF THE TROPHIES

OUR CAMELS CROSSING THE AKSU

THE GORGE BELOW CAMP

AMONG the many happy hunting-grounds in which I have found myself during the last thirty years, I know of none which has interested me more than the Great Altai mountains, where, last year, I had the good fortune to spend a month in search of the Ovis ammon. I have said interested me, and it should be understood that this interest and experience were from the sportsman's point of view, quite unique, owing to the total absence of any native hunters to assist, or even to give the least clue as to where the great sheep might be found. It may be superfluous to add that one invariably has the services and benefit of a second, and usually very keen, pair of eyes to assist in finding the game and subsequently to help in the stalk. In the present instance, however, it was a case of single blessedness with a vengeance. The reason of this absolute dearth of local shikaris is accounted for by the rooted objection which the native inhabitant of these wilds, the nomad Hassack, has to walking. To his ideas it is not the thing to do. Ponies and camels, again, are plentiful, and the Hassacks of both sexes, when on feet, shod as they are in a kneeboot with a grotesquely high heel, stump along in a most uncomfortable manner, as though every step would bring them down. Luckily, I had hunted the big sheep before, and was fairly conversant with his ways, so one morning soon after dawn, I started off to search the valley, at the mouth of which we were encamped. The morning was beautifully clear, and I took matters somewhat easily, as I had left directions for one of our Mongol escort to follow me up with the lunch and my pony; for, as usual with these gentlemen, he was late, and enjoying his easily-earned "twelve" hours' repose. Needless to add, I saw nothing of him—nor of the lunch—that day. Working my way steadily up the half-frozen stream at the bottom of the valley, after a while I made out the forms of two rams at the head of the nala. They appeared to suspect nothing, and soon began to feed on the new grass shoots. Then two finer rams came to view. I felt I was in luck, but "there's many a slip." Scanning the rugged ground and looking for the best way to approach them I soon recognized that it was not such an easy matter. To follow up the stream bed, over the snow and ice meant being seen. The left side of the valley, a slope of broken rocks and shale, was equally out of the question. I therefore resolved to try the rightside, though not without misgivings, on account of the snow slopes and forbidding-looking precipices. I concluded that if I succeeded in tracking this right side that I should be able to work round and above the sheep. After waiting for an hour, the fine beasts made things somewhat easier for me by feeding down and behind a small rocky point. During my long watch I had been dreading lest the Mongol with the ponies should appear and scare away the sheep. Chancing this, however, and judging I knew my Mongol, I started off up the stream. Some little way on I managed to cross on a snow-bridge, expecting at any moment to disappear through the soft snow. Then followed a long and steady ascent over huge boulders of broken rock, interspersed with soft, wet shale. Here was where the local knowledge of the man on the spot would have been invaluable, for I had not been able, up to this, to discern that to reach the high ridge immediately above the sheep was impracticable. A change of plans was, therefore, necessary. Holding on, I tried to scale the rocks to the right, which rocks, I am convinced, would have delighted the heart of an ibex or thar. Had a hunter been with me, I could have succeeded in this clambering ascent; as it was, I had to work down to the lower ground again and make the best of a bad job across the open. A bad job, too, it turned out, for having got within one hundred yards of the ridge, behind which the sheep had disappeared, to my disgust I discovered two rams standing on the top, staring straight down at me. Sinking slowly to the ground, I sat motionless. One ram then moved behind the ridge, and the other, having been joined by a third, followed suit. The last sheep carried a fine head, and was very white—evidently an old one. As they had moved off slowly, I hoped that I might find them feeding, and be still able to get on terms; but they took no chances, and when I got to the top of the ridge there was not a sign of them. I was just about to retire when I saw a grand sight. Sev- [illegible] stalking quietly away along the top of a stony ridge. The leader, who was the largest and whitest, had thick, massive horns, and they all, with one exception, would have made a fine trophy. I congratulated myself on thus getting a second chance, and watched them as they went "stiltily" along, in the way they move when scared. At length the procession stopped, and they lay down on the steep side of the slope, from whence they commanded the whole of the valley. Off I went again, over huge, sharp boulders of broken rock; but I was soon held up on coming to a large open patch of deep snow. There was nothing for it but to wait patiently and make myself as comfortable and warm as possible among the boulders.

After an hour or so, about 1:30 p. m., they rose, stretched themselves, scanned the whole country-side, and again moved slowly off, away to the north. They were evidently in a nervous mood. Following them, after a while I crossed the snow patch, ploughing through the snow, which in places was up to my middle, and following in the deep tracks of the herd.

It was stiff work, and was followed by a still stiffer climb to the top of a razor-backed ridge. This I descended, the rams still in view. The ground here was quite open; but wild sheep usually look for danger from below, and I remained unnoticed. They finally disappeared slowly round the slope of a high rounded hill, about eight hundred yards ahead. I quickly started off to gain the crest of this hill, hoping to intercept the game, but was doomed to further disappointment. There was not a sign of them. My aneroid here registered eleven thousand feet, and we had reached the highest part of the downs. A cold wind was now blowing, mists came rolling up out of the valleys and it looked like snow.

Taking up a couple of holes in my belt and a pull at my flask, I followed along the north face of the mountain. Avoiding the patches of soft snow, in which I noticed the marks of sheep's hoofs, suddenly on the opposite side, and some way below, I saw my five old friends, evidently bent on shifting their quarters still further to the west. They must have got my wind. Clouds occasionally hid me from the sheep, so, under cover of these, I determined to make a dash back for less open ground, and to move down and try to get in a shot. I had now been steadily on the move for over twelve hours, and had worked back towards the open valley, though away from the camp. My hurried move failed. Now that the excitement of the stalk was over, I vented deep anathemas on the Mongol's head for not having brought up the ponies. When within a mile or so of camp I was met by our whole retinue, who had turned out to conduct me in. Search parties had gone out, thinking I was lost. After a hearty meal of our standing dish—Hassack mutton—I soon turned in, and thus terminated one of the hardest and most pleasant days which have fallen to my lot, and certainly one that I am never likely to forget.

The next few days I spent looking for those fine [illegible] again, but without [illegible] sheep, when thoroughly scared, travel many miles, and successfully hide themselves.

Leaving camp at 4:30 one morning, shortly before dawn, the two hunters and I had not been long at work when the Kalmuk pulled up short, but too late, for we had been seen first by a flock of nine rams, who were taking their early feed on the side of a steep ravine. Off they went, towards higher ground, but in no great haste. Riding up to the ridge along which they had disappeared, we dismounted, and soon viewed them again. They were some distance off, feeding on an open slope, which appeared to be secure from attack; but there was one weak spot. After scanning the herd and noticing three or four good heads among them, I started off with Husein to stalk. A warm job it proved, up that steep, loose shale slope, and the pace was perforce slow. At length we made the crest, and took it easy to study the situation. The wind, though light, was shifty, but all seemed well, for the herd were busy feeding. They were what appeared to be about one hundred and fifty yards off, but on a slope somewhat below us. The difficulty was to select the finest head, for to raise one's self more than enough to just peep over would have soon ended matters. Under such circumstances one is always apt to be deceived as to which head is going to beat previous records! The question, however, was brought to an abrupt conclusion by the herd getting their heads up and beginning to look suspicious. In another second they would have been off, so, taking a quick aim, I fired at the chest of what looked like the largest, as he stood head towards me. A rush and a stampede ensued across the soft face of the steep slope below us. The animals were so bunched up that it was impossible to pick out the largest, and the result of my three shots was to bowl over a moderate-sized one only. The herd then disappeared at racing speed, and when next seen they were in the big valley a long way below. We descended and cut up the dead sheep. This finished, and the old Kalmuk carrying the head over his shoulders, we rode off round the slopes after the herd, eventually pulling up and dismounting at the end of a long spur. Here, while on the look-out, we suddenly saw the herd, now only seven in number, come bolting back towards us, evidently disturbed in their flight by my fellow-sportsman, who just then appeared on the top of the mountain. The oves looked like charging straight at us, but swerved off and made up the mountain, except one, who, overcome by fright or curiosity, forgot his usual cunning and stopped to have a look at me. I heard the "clop" of the bullet as it struck, and he jumped completely round, then disappeared round a small spur a short distance off. Feeling quite elated at such good fortune, I followed up, expecting to find the sheep lying dead. Imagine my disappointment—he had vanished. There was no time to be lost, so, starting the Kalmuk off in pursuit over the shoulder of the mountain, Husein and I took up the blood tracks. Twice during this latter proceeding I heard the report of the Kalmuk's blunderbuss, and momentarily expected to see him return smiling; then, thinking all was right, we returned to where the ponies had been left. They also had all three vanished, leaving portions of the first dead sheep's carcass scattered about the mountainside. It was some time before we had all collected again and the Kalmuk returned, having, I understood, had a great chase after the wounded ram and marked it down in a nala, not far from where we had started the day's work. Loading up the ponies, away we went again, searching fruitlessly for a long time among the numerous nalas. Things looked bad. It was getting late, and we were just about to abandon the search till the morrow, when, as good luck would have it, the old Kalmuk stopped and pointed below as he did so. I was off my pony in a second, and, peering over, saw the fine old ram, only just able to stand and looking very sick, about fifty feet below. One shot in the shoulder finished him. It shows the extraordinary vitality of these fine animals that, though badly wounded, he had been able to keep going for so long. My shot had just missed the middle of his chest, and had caught him near the point of the right shoulder and raked along his ribs. His horns measured [illegible]

HERE IS REALLY GOOD IDEA

Fire Insurance Would Be an Easy Matter if It Could Be Conducted That Way.

Senator Williams at a dinner at Yazoo, said in condemnation of a mooted tariff change:

"They who advocate this change know just as much about the tariff as the old lady knew about fire insurance.

"This old lady visited an insurance office and insured her barn for $3,500. The policy was drawn up, signed, sealed and handed over to her and she put it in her cabba and started out.

"'But hold on, ma'am,' said the agent. 'I must ask you, please, for the first year's premium.'

"'The first year's premium,' said she. 'And how much will that be?'

"'There it is, ma'am, written on the policy,' said the agent. 'A small matter of $24.'

"'Oh,' said the old lady, 'I'm in a hurry this morning. You just let the premiums stand and deduct them when the barn burns down.'"

"Was your wife in the suffrage parade?" asked Morrowby, meeting Jeliffe on the street.

"You bet she was!" said Jeliffe enthusiastically. "Why, she is the flag bearer for her chapter!"

"Mercy!" cried Morrowby. "Do you mean to tell me that little woman carried a flag all that distance?"

"Well—no," said Jeliffe. "My chauffeur and I took turns at it."—Judge.

WHITE PIMPLES ON HEAD

Ransom, Ill.—"The trouble started on our baby when he was only about two weeks old. Started like little white pimples, looked like an old scab of blood and matter. His whole head was covered for a few months, then it went to his ear, shoulders, and his whole body. It seemed to come out thick and sticky on his head, while on the other parts of his body it was more like water coming out of the skin. He would scratch until the eruption would be all covered with blood and gradually spread. The least little stir or rub would cause the sores to bleed, spread and itch. Never had a full night's sleep, restless all night.

"The sores were horrid to look at. It lasted until he was about two and a half years old. Then we saw an eczema advertisement in the paper to use ——, but it did no good. Then we used Cuticura Soap and Cuticura Ointment. We put the Cuticura Ointment on thick at bed time and put a tight hood on so he could not scratch the sores. Then we washed it clean with Cuticura Soap and warm water twice a day, and he was completely cured." (Signed) Mrs. E. F. Sulzberger, Dec. 30, 1911.

RECORD OF A GREAT MEDICINE

Hooper, Nebraska.—"I am very glad to tell how Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound has helped me. For five years I suffered from female troubles so I was scarcely able to do my work. I took doctors' medicines and used local treatments but was not helped. I had such awful bearing down pains and my back was so weak I could hardly walk and could not ride. I often had to sit up nights to sleep and my friends thought I could not live long. At my request my husband got me a bottle of Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound and I commenced to take it. By the time I had taken the seventh bottle my health had returned and I began doing my washing and was a well woman. At one time for three weeks I did all the work for eighteen boarders with no signs of my old trouble returning. Many have taken your medicine after seeing what it did for me. I would not take $1000 and be where I was. You have my permission to use my name if it will aid anyone."—Mrs. SUSIE TEMPLETON, Hooper, Nebraska.

The Pinkham record is a proud and peerless one. It is a record of constant victory over the obstinate ills of woman—ills that deal out despair. It is an established fact that Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound has restored health to thousands of such suffering women. Why don't you try it if you need such a medicine?

A WONDERFUL DISCOVERY.

In this age of research and experiment, all nature is ransacked by the scientific for the comfort and happiness of man. Science has indeed made giant strides in the past century, and among the—by no means least important—discoveries in medicine is that of Therapion, which has been used with great success in French Hospitals and that it is worthy the attention of those who suffer from kidney, bladder, nervous diseases, chronic weaknesses, ulcers, skin eruptions, piles, &c., there is no doubt. In fact it seems evident from the big stir created amongst specialists, that THERAPION is destined to cast into oblivion all those questionable remedies that were formerly the sole reliance of medical men. It is of course impossible to tell sufferers all we should like to tell them in this short article, but those who would like to know more about this remedy that has effected so many—we might almost say, miraculous cures, should send addressed envelope for FREE book to Dr. Le Clerc Med. Co., Haverstock Road, Hampstead, London, Eng. and decide for themselves whether the New French Remedy "THERAPION" No. 1, No. 2 or No. 3 is what they require and have been seeking in vain during a life of misery, suffering, ill health and unhappiness. A BOUQUET OF REVOLUTIONS

REAL STORIES FROM LIFE OF A MASTER ADVENTURER

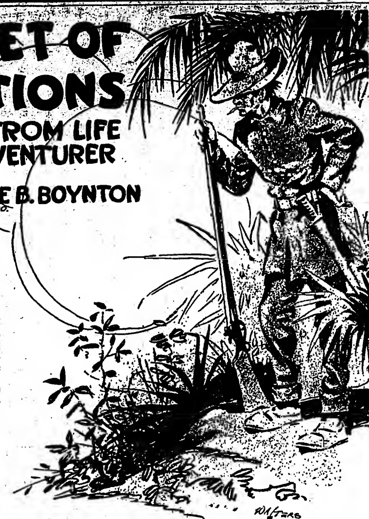
COPYRIGHT BY RIDGWAY CO.



WITHOUT knowing where or how the cruise would end, but confident it would lead to trouble—though I did not imagine how much of it there really would be or how unpleasant it would prove—I bought the Alice Ada, a brigantine of 300 tons, and got a general cargo for Rosario, Brazil, on the River Persva. From Rosario I went 100 miles up the river to St. Stephens and took on a cargo of wheat for Rio Janeiro. While the cargo was being unloaded my expectant eye distinguished signs of a nice little revolution which was just being shaped up, so I sold my ship and took quarters at the Hotel Freitas to watch developments.

When the last emperor of Brazil, Dom Pedro II., was dragged out of bed at night and deported without the firing of a shot, in the "peaceful revolution" of November 15, 1889, Deodora da Fonseca was made president. Before his weakness had become apparent he was made constitutional president, and Floriano Peixotto was elected vice-president. Deodoro's policy was weak and vacillating, and his popularity waned rapidly. A revolution had been quietly formed by Floriano, the vice-president. He soon had the army at his back and gained the support of Admiral Mello, ranking officer of the Brazilian navy, and Admiral Soldanha da Gama, commandant of the naval academy. They brought matters to a head on the morning of November 23, 1891. Mello took up a position at the foot of the main street of Rio in the cruiser Riachuelo, the finest ship in the navy, trained his guns on the palace Itumary, and sent word to Deodoro that he would open fire on him in two hours if he did not abdicate in favor of Floriano. Deodoro abdicated in two minutes, dropping dead soon afterward from heart disease, and Floriano was proclaimed president.

Before he had time to get his new chair well warmed he had a row with Mello, who considered that he was rightfully entitled to be the power behind the throne.

Mello worked chiefly among naval officers, aristocrats, adherents of San Pedro and the Catholic clergy, and in the end they all became his allies.

As Mello's plot shaped up I began to suspect that his real purpose was to restore Dom Pedro to the throne and make himself the power behind it.

It was amusing to watch the development of Mello's revolution. One would have thought two friendly leaders were planning rival surprise parties, in which there was to be nothing more serious than the throwing of confetti.

It was along in July or August, 1893, that Mello sent for me and expressed a wish that I go down to Santa Catarina island, off the southern coast of Brazil, and blow up the Republica, the one Brazilian warship whose officers had so far remained loyal to Floriano.

While we were still negotiating I received a call from one of Floriano's aids, who asked me to accompany him to the palace. He took me in the rear entrance and up a back stairway to Floriano's private sala, where, after presenting me, he left me, alone with the president.

"I understand," said Floriano, "that you were in Venezuela with President Guzman and have had military training and experience."

"That is correct, sir."

"I am told, too, that you have made a study of high explosives, and have invented a remarkable torpedo."

"That is also true."

"Would you be willing to undertake a mission that would involve considerable danger, but for which you would be well paid?"

"I am open to anything except vulgar assassination. That is my business."

"What do you charge for your services?"

"That depends entirely on the nature of the work."

"Consider yourself, then, in the service of Brazil."

A few days later the revolution was declared, under conditions such as one would look for on the light-opera stage, but never in real life, not even in South America. On the evening of September 5, Floriano went to the opera, accompanied by Mello, Soldanha and several other officers of the army and navy, and they all sat together in the presidential box. Mello and Soldanha excused themselves after the second act. They left their cloaks in the box and said they would be back in a few minutes. Knowing full well the reason of their departure, Floriano bowed them out with an ironical excess of politeness.

At daybreak Mello seized all of the government shipping in the bay and announced a blockade of Rio harbor. He then sent word to Floriano that if he did not abdicate, without naming his successor, by four o'clock that afternoon, he would bombard the city.

Floriano's reply was an emphatic refusal to abdicate, and precisely at four o'clock Mello answered it with one shell from a three-inch gun, which exploded near the American consulate and killed a foreigner. During the next week Mello fired 40 or 50 shots into the city every day, but they did little damage.

Very soon after the firing of the first shot, Italian, English, German, Austrian and Portuguese warships appeared at Rio, ostensibly to protect the rights of their citizens.

About a week after the firing of the first shot I was on my way to the water front to witness the regular afternoon duel between the Aquidaban and Fort Santa Cruz, when I was overtaken by [illegible] carriage and [illegible] nel Pimentel, whom I knew well, asked me to get in with him, as he had orders for me from Floriano. He drove along the shore of the bay to a new galvanized building at a point some distance beyond the island of the naval school and near the railway machine shops. On the way he explained that this building had been erected for my use and in it I was to construct, as rapidly as possible, a large torpedo with which to destroy the Aquidaban.

The torpedo I built for this business was the largest I had ever made.

While Mello had seized all of the government vessels in the harbor, there were a few tugs left, which, to prevent his interference, were flying the British flag, on the pretense that they were owned by Englishmen. I was to be given one of these tugs, and my plan was to steal around into Nichtheroy bay at night and anchor close under the hill at the end of the peninsula, where I would be hidden from the rebel fleet. In the morning I would load the torpedo and wait the daily exchange of cannon courtesies between the Aquidaban and the fort. An officer at Santa Cruz was to signal me when Mello left his anchorage and then, towing the submerged torpedo by wire rope too small to be detected, I would steam out across the course of the Aquidaban, which would pick up the towing line on her bow, drag the torpedo alongside and be destroyed by the contact.

My tug, in charge of a French engineer and four Brazilians, was sent down to me on the afternoon of September 25, and as soon as it was dark, with the torpedo covered with canvas on deck and twelve 50-pound boxes of dynamite in the pilot house, we steamed around to Nictheroy bay. To have loaded the torpedo before we started would have been extremely dangerous, for any accidental pressure on one of its arms would have blown all of us to pieces. We anchored well out of sight of the rebel fleet, and as soon as it was daylight I unscrewed the manhole of the torpedo, and proceeded to pack it full of dynamite.

I was just putting in the last box of the explosive when there was a shrill whistle, and a launch from the Sirius swung alongside. The lieutenant in charge jumped aboard of us and came aft before I could brush the dynamite from my arms.

"Who commands this craft?" he demanded.

"I do," I replied.

"What are you doing with that flag up there?" pointing to the British ensign.

"That flag was there when I came aboard and took command," I said, which was true. "I am flying it for protection from a pirate fleet, just as others are displaying it on Rio bay and in the city. Your commanding officer has sanctioned that custom by his silence. I am an officer of the established Brazilian government - obeying the orders of my superiors in Brazilian waters, and I claim the right to take advantage of that custom, if I care to do so, just as others have done and are doing."

"I think the other cases are different from yours," replied the lieutenant. "What is that?" pointing to the dynamite.

"Examine it for yourself."

"It looks like dynamite."

"Probably."

"Well, sir, I am ordered by Captain Lang to take you on board her majesty's ship Sirius."

It was no use to make a fight, so I accompanied him, with excessive and sarcastic politeness. He took all my crew with him, leaving a guard on the tug. Captain Lang was on deck waiting for me and was quite agitated when I was brought before him, but he was much more heated before we parted company, and it was a warm day to begin with.

"Captain Boynton, what does this mean?" he roared.

"What does what mean?" I innocently answered.

"Your lying over there in a vessel loaded with munitions of war and flying the British flag!"

"It means simply that I am an officer in the Brazilian army, on duty under the guns of a rebel fleet, and that I am flying the British flag for whatever virtue it might have in protecting me from that pirate, Admiral Mello. That flag has been used as a protection by many others and you have silently acquiesced in such use of it."

"But I tell you that it is piracy to fly the British flag over the ship of another nation and carrying munitions of war!"

"It might be just as well, Captain Lang, for you to remember that you are not now on the high seas. An act of the British parliament is of no effect within another country, and if you will consult your chart you will find that we are in the enclosed waters of Brazil. Under such conditions no mandate of yours which affects my rights can be enforced unless you have the nerve to take the chances that go with your act."

"You may soon find to the contrary!" shouted the captain, who was letting his temper get the best of him. "I have a mind to send you to Admiral Mello as a prisoner! You know what he would do to you!"

"Oh, Captain Lang!" I said jeeringly. "You know you wouldn't do that!"

"And pray why not, sir?"

"Because you dare not do it, and that's why!" I told him, as I pointed to the U. S. S. Charleston, which, with her decks cleared for action, was anchored only a few hundred yards off to port. "I dare you to do it! I defy you to do it! Send me aboard the Aquidaban if you dare!"

I was making a strong bluff, and I got away with it. [illegible] master at arms and placed me in his charge, ordered his launch and dashed off to the Charleston. He returned in half an hour and without another word to me ordered a lieutenant to take me aboard the Charleston.

I will not deny that I was a bit easier in my mind when I saw my own flag flying over me, yet had I known the treatment I was to receive under it I would have felt quite differently.

It was easy to see, from the reception Captain Picking gave me, that he had been influenced by the attitude of Captain Lang. I told him that I was an American citizen, temporarily in the employment of the Brazilian government; that I had violated no law of the United States or of Brazil, and I demanded that I be set ashore. He coldly informed me that I would be confined to the ship, at least until he had consulted with the American minister and communicated with Washington, and soon after I arrived on the Charleston I was confined to my room, as a dangerous character who threatened the peace of nations. With this decidedly unpleasant recollection, however, it is a pleasure to know that the other American naval officers, who arrived later, took exactly my view of the whole situation and became champions of my cause. They told Picking that Mello was a pirate and should be treated as such, and that I was being deprived of my liberty without the slightest warrant of law, but they were powerless to accomplish my release.

Looking forward a little, the manner in which that old fighter, Rear Admiral Benham, put an end to the "revolution" in the following January, soon after his arrival at Rio, should be well remembered, for it was a noble deed and an example of the good judgment generally displayed by American naval officers when they are not hampered by foolish orders from Washington. In the vain hope of arousing enthusiasm for his lost cause, Mello had gone down the coast, where he figuratively and literally took to the woods when he saw the folly of his mission, leaving Da Gama in command of the blockading fleet. The captains of several American merchant ships, who had been prevented for weeks from landing their cargoes for Rio, appealed to Admiral Benham, who took prompt action.

To show his contempt for the rebels, whom he properly regarded as pirates, Admiral Benham assigned the smallest ship of his squadron, the little Detroit, commanded by that great little man, Commander (now Rear Admiral, retired) W. H. Brownson to escort the merchantmen up to the dock.

The "revolution" ended right there, but unfortunately I was not present to witness its collapse.

It was in vexed Venezuela that I was destined to end my days of deviltry, but not until after a protracted warfare, none the less bitter because it was conducted at long range, with Castro the Contemptible, who came into power two years after I had finally settled down at Santa Catalina as manager for the Orinoco company. Cipriano Castro had been in congress as diputado, as member of the house, from one of the Andean districts while I was in Caracas with President Crespo, and, though he was regarded as a good fighter and a disturbing element, he was never considered as a presidential possibility.

After getting the development work well started, I returned to Caracas and early in 1879 resumed my old confidential position with President Crespo. His term expired the following February and I found that he had already decided on General Ignacio Andrade as his successor. He had planned to continue as dictator of the country, a la Guzman, and spend much of his idle time and money abroad, and he wanted a man who could be relied on to keep his organization intact and turn the office back to him at the end of his term, for the Venezuelan constitution prohibits a president from succeeding himself.

The people idolized Crespo, and he had such a strong grip on the country that he was able to carry out his plan, but with disastrous results. For a popular election it was the weirdest thing that could be imagined. [illegible] was immediately followed by mutterings of [illegible] class of citizens and [illegible] Hernandez, the famed "El Mocho," who was minister of public improvements in Crespo's cabinet, but an opponent of the new president, took to the hills at the head of 3,000 troops. Crespo really was responsible for the curse of Castro, for had he selected a strong man as his successor the mountain brigand never could have commanded a force sufficiently powerful to overthrow him.

Within a month Andrade went through the form of appointing Crespo commander in chief of the army, in order that he might clinch his dictatorship. For a while Crespo contented himself with enjoying his new title and directing operations from the capital, but the Hernandes revolution finally assumed such proportions that he took the field in person to stamp it out. The two armies met in the mountains near Victoria, June 12, 1898. Hernandez was led into a trap, given a drubbing and captured. After the battle Crespo walked across the field and was leaning over a wounded man when he was shot from behind and instantly killed.

Some few months after Crespo's death, Castro, who had made himself governor of the state of Los Andes, visited Caracas and called on Andrade to demand an important position in the new administration, as the price of peace. Andrade, to his credit be it said, flouted him. Castro left the Yellow house in a rage, sought the councils of Andrade's enemies, and, after many conferences, a general insurrection was arranged for early the following summer. The presidency was to go to the leader who developed the greatest strength during the campaign.

Castro learned that he was alone in the revolution, his promised partners having failed to take the field on account of bickerings and jealousies among themselves. This discovery and the addition of Ferrer's forces gave him his first really serious notion that he might become president and he marched forward in a frenzy of bombastic joy.

By this time the people of Venezuela, believing that no one could be worse than Andrade, and finding out, as had Castro himself, what a powerful person he really was, accepted him as their master.

Almost the first thing he did was to annul our concession, along with a dozen others, on the ground that its terms had not been complied with, as the beginning of his war on all foreigners. I denied this right to cancel our grant, especially as it contained a clause which stipulated that any disagreement between the government and the concessionaire should be referred to the Alta Corte Federale, or Supreme Court for adjustment.

The troops were continually spying on us and annoying us with fictitious charges, but it was a year or more before the government, angered by its failure to get rid of me, resorted to extreme measures. A new governor was sent down with strict orders to remove me, by force if necessary. He advanced toward the house with about 75 soldiers. I ordered my men into the rifle pits and met the general at the gate.

The general could see my rifle pits, but he did not know how many men they held nor how well they could shoot. After a short consultation with his staff, he gave the order to advance, while he bravely directed operations from the rear. As his men crossed the line and eight of them fell. They continued to advance, and we fired again, dropping nine more of them, while several others were hit. That was too much for them, and they broke and ran, leaving seven dead and ten badly wounded.

In two or three days they came back, with their force slightly increased, and the general again called on me to surrender under penalty of being arrested as a disturbing factor. I gave him the same reply as before, and, after thinking it over for a while, he marched his troops away again.

That little encounter produced pronounced respect for the Americans among Castro's soldiers, and they did not give us much trouble afterward.

This enforced idleness eventually became intolerable, and early in 1906, the company in the meantime having sent one of its officers to Caracas to protect its interests, I returned to New York, after having held the fort for ten years. I came back much poorer in pocket, but with a fund of information regarding Venezuela and its people [illegible]

TELLS OF VATICAN

Magnificent Structures in Rome Covered With Vines.

Palace Lies Apart and Distinct From Rest of Rome, Not Removed by Isolation, but Through Its Atmosphere.

Rome, Italy.—Columns have been written regarding the personal appearance of the pope, his part in the ceremony of the consistory and the pomp and splendor that surrounds the papal court, yet relatively little is known of his intimate personality. This, in part, may be explained by reason of the ceremony that surrounds the pontiff and by reason of the care that has been taken to guard him from the approach of ill-intentioned plebeians.

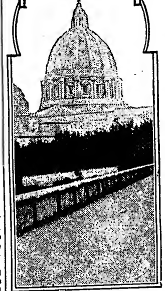
The Vatican itself is a magnificent old pile whose spires, roofs and gables rise high above an encircling grove of ancient trees that decorate its gardens. The quiet serenity of the vine-covered masonry, the peaceful majesty lent by the hand of ages and the atmosphere that seems to surround the hallowed spot through its long association with the ecclesiastical history, make its imposing architecture the most prominent in Rome.

This feature is all the more accentuated after a visit to the ancient Roman amphitheater and the great aqueducts and mausoleums of the Roman emperors. These, in truth, are imposing, but they contrast sharply with the buildings that house the pope and form the foot of the Roman Catholic church. The Roman buildings are inanimate and magnificent in their death; while the Vatican is animate and doubly imposing through the soul that lives within.

The Vatican, indeed, lies apart and distinct from the rest of the city. It is not removed through its isolation, but through its atmosphere. On the one hand is the magnificent palace of King Victor Emmanuel, busy with the toil of war and feeding the countless avenues that lead to the Ghetto, and on the other is the palace of the pope, vast, silent and imposing, set in an atmosphere of its own and as much apart from the busy city as though it were surrounded by a desert.

Of the pope himself, his rites and character, there are a thousand stories current. Pius X, the son of a poor peasant, is hailed everywhere as the Father, and to his people he has always retained those simple manners and customs that marked his novitiate as parish priest and teacher of the peasants.

Something besides mere anecdote, however, forms the foundation for these stories of simplicity and nobility of character. There is in Rome at the present day physical proof of the pontiff's former obscurity. This proof lies with his two sisters, Lucrecia and Tereso, unobtrusive peasant women who have followed the pope from his humble home.



In the Gardens of the Vatican.
St. Peter's in the Distance.

Lucrecia, the cook, in particular, is keen and critical in the interest of the pontiff. It was she whom he called from Riese when he was first attacked by the rheumatic gout that has proved so painful and so dangerous during his later years. And it is she, assisted by her sister, Teresa, who now supervises the pope's meals and tends him in his illness.

Another interesting figure of the pope's household is his brother, Angelo Sarto, a humble postman, who spends what time he may in company with the pontiff and his sisters. It is his brother upon whom the pope relies for that masculine companionship that is a part of every mortal. And these two old men, both handsome and with thick, white hair, alike, and yet not alike, are the closest companions.

Woman Fights Bulldog to Save Kitten's Life

HE LOOKS IT — $5 FINE
HE IS GENTLE AS A LAMB

WASHING[illegible] [illegible]lling narrative of [illegible] Josephino Throckmorton, author, artist and lover of "our dumb friends," braved a savage bulldog in a vain endeavor to save a kitten's life was disclosed the other day by police court records.

Miss Throckmorton, who lives at 121 C street, southeast, was in court as a witness in the case against Miss Lillie Hinkle of 119 G street, southeast, charged with permitting her bulldog to run at large without a muzzle, and in another case against Edward Wells, Miss Hinkie's brother-in-law, also living at 119 C street, northwest, for cruelty to animals, in that he permitted the dog to kill the kitten.

There was a small kitten in the alley, and Miss Throckmerton and the bulldog saw the kitten at about the same time, it is stated. Miss Throckmorton called to Wells to hold back the dog, and ran toward the helpless little kitten. But Wells, it is said, did not hold the dog, so Miss Throckmorton, who loves but does not fear beasts, she stated, seized the bulldog by the neck.

Finally the bulldog got away from Miss Throckmorton, and with one crunch of his powerful jaws, and one shake of his massive head, ended all and every, singly, separately and individually, nine lives of the kitten.

Then Miss Throckmortou swore the warrant against Wells and Miss Hinkle. She said she did not think that persons ought to be allowed to permit such dangerous animals as the bulldog to be at large without being muzzled.

Judge Pugh, who tried the case, fined Wells $20 for cruelty to animals, and fined Miss Hinkie $5 for allowing the dog to be at large unmuzzled and without a leash.

Glories of Men's Hose Tempt Their Wives

FOR months the husbands of Washington have wondered why the "sock boxes" which adorn their chiffoniers have always been empty.

Wives when questioned have responded: "Your socks are all dirty, dear. Why don't you think to put them in the wash and then you need not growl about them every day or so."

In his ignorance the husband has ceased to "growl" and made the best of it, usually buying a fresh supply on his way down town. The mistress of the household has kept a straight face and said nothing.

But stolen socks, like murder, will out, and thousands of former "growlers" will know what has become of the "sobbing hose" which in times past have vanished from their wardrobes or dressing tables.

Saleswomen in the hosiery departments the other day explained away the mystery. Appropriated and not "dirty" is the word which is the key to the situation in short. Washington women have been and are now wearing their husbands' socks. And one of man's last claims to superiority has been taken from him without his knowledge.

MIGHTY QUEER WHERE ALL MY SOCKS ARE GOIN' —DOG ON' TH' LUCK

"Of course women are wearing men's socks," said a saleswoman in a Pennsylvania avenue department store the other day. "Society women are wearing their husbands' socks these hot days and holding them up with their husbands' garters as well.

"If women had only been content to wear plain hosiery all would have been well. They clamored for color and figure, however. The garden, the rainbow, the peacock were robbed for color schemas for masculine hose. The women became envious. The shades to which they had access were dull and tame. Boldly they reached out and began wearing men's half hose in all their gaudy colors.

"Every day we sell the women dozens of pairs of half hose. Most of them say, 'I want something suitable for my husband,' but that is all a bluff, you know."

Banks May Adopt the Finger Print System

WE USE THE FINGER PRINT SYSTEM IN THIS BANK
NOT FER ME, —I DON'T THINK MUCH UV THIS FINGER PRINT SYSTEM

FINGER PRINTS as a means of identifying depositors who cannot write their names may be adopted by Washington Banks. Among the patrons of the banks, especially of those which do a savings business, the proportion of illiterates is considerable, it was said by bankers the other day, and the fact that some of the Brooklyn banks have adopted the system of finger print signatures for their illiterate customers has suggested to local bankers that the plan might be feasible for meeting conditions here.

The chance of making a mistake on a finger print is said to be very remote. In the first place, the marks on a person's fingers or hand never change during life, and in the second place, there is only one chance in sixty-two billions, it has been estimated, where two persons would develop the same finger prints. Heretofore, the finger print method has been used almost exclusively by the police. As a part of the Bertillon system it has been used to trace criminals, but the banks' methods are different.

They take prints of the first three fingers on the right hand, omitting the thumb. These prints are made with indelible ink on a card which is filed away along with the depositor's name and pedigree. When he presents his bank book to draw out his account he is questioned as to his pedigree. Should his questions prove unsatisfactory he is then asked to make a duplicate finger print for the purpose of comparison. This is done by simply sprinkling black powder on the moisture left by the fingers on a bank card. When the powder is blown off the print remains and the comparison can then be made.

Street Car Company Promises Millennium

STREET railway companies are going to put into effect a policy of not fighting claims they believe to be just. If they hurt you or tear your clothes or smash your hat they are going to pay you without any fuss. All you do is to walk up to the claim agent's office, tell him your troubles, point out that the conductor knows how it happened, and you get a check.

Well, at least one of the street railway companies of Washington says that is what they are going to do, and that one is the Washington Railway and Electric company, according to F. J. Whitehead, its claim department manager.

According to Mr. Whitehead, an era is going to come in the history of public service corporations that will make legal battles unnecessary.

The old day, when you had to have a dozen witnesses, just as good if not better than the company's, as well as a stack of Bibles, and a first-class lawyer to prove that an accident actually did occur to you for which you are entitled to damages, has gone out of [illegible] fashion, says Mr. Whitehead.

"We do not have time for these old-fashioned fights," Mr. Whitehead said, discussing the subject. "They are out of date. The fights are expensive for the railway company, and the Washington Railway and Electric company, for one, intends in the future to pay such claims when they are sincere and just without the formality and expense of legal prosecution and defense.

"The modern policy is to keep customers of a public service corporation in good humor—to keep them as customers, and not antagonize them. I think most large public service corporations are coming to understand that principle and are putting it into [illegible]

PROMINENT PEOPLE

MRS. LITTLETON SCORES VICTORY

Mrs. Martin W. Littleton, wife of Representative Littleton of New York, won a notable victory the other day before the senate committee on library, when she secured by unanimous vote an authorization for a favorable report on Senator Martine's resolution authorizing the appointment of a joint committee of five senators and five representatives to investigate and report on the feasibility of having the government acquire Monticello, the home of Thomas Jefferson.

Mrs. Littleton became interested in having the government acquire the estate and tomb of Thomas Jefferson and preserve it, like Mount Vernon and Arlington, after she had made a visit to the place. A year ago she sent out an interesting pamphlet devoted to proving the patriotic duty of the government to acquire and preserve Monticello. Since then Mrs. Littleton has kept up the fight over many obstacles.

The most formidable of these has been the opposition of Representative Jefferson M. Levy, who owns Monticello, and declares that he will not sell it to the government. When Mrs. Littleton appeared before the committee she found confronting her Judge R. T. W. Duke, Jr., of Charlottesville, Va., who appeared as the representative of Mr. Levy, and who took issue with Mrs. Littleton's statement in regard to the present condition of Monticello.

She had told the committee that "the roads leading to the Jefferson estate were atrocious; that the residence needed painting, and that the general appearance of the place was one of neglect and decay." Mr. Duke explained that Representative Levy had no desire to sell Monticello, even to the government. He insisted that the place was kept in repair. Senator Cummins, a member of the committee, suggested that Monticello might be acquired by the exercise of the right of eminent domain.

"We have taken private property from private owners for public purposes heretofore, and there is no question that we can do so in this case if it becomes necessary," suggested Senator Cummins.

The force of this suggestion appeared to appeal to Judge Duke, who observed that in spite of Mr. Levy's unwillingness to sell the property, he believed that if the congressman could be convinced that there was a wide popular interest in acquiring it for patriotic use, that he would yield.

COUSIN OF CZAR IS UNDER GUARD

Grand Duke Gabriel Constantinovich, a cousin of the czar, twenty-five years old, supplies the latest court romance. He insists on marrying Xenia Ivanovna, formerly his sister's governess and now his mother's companion.

Gabriel is an officer of the household troops and enjoyed life like his comrades up to two months ago. Then he began to sit at the feet of Xenia, whom he had known for years without taking particular notice of her.

Xenia owns to being thirty, is dark, slim and by no means a beauty.

People recall the Emperor Paul's infatuation for a middle-aged maid of honor, who had more influence over him than anyone else. But Gabriel's father, Grand Duke Constantine, is of course angry and insists on having the boy banished to some distant province. The czar objects, saying that sort of punishment has always resulted in lovers getting married. So Xenia has been sent to Moscow with a handsome pension, which will be stopped the moment she renews association with her high-born lover.

Gabriel went mad with disappointment and rage when he learned that his love had left the ducal palace. It was a long time before he found out where she had gone. Then he determined to follow her and escaped from his rooms by a rope ladder, but was caught at the gates and ignominiously hurried back. Since then he has been under a strong guard, ostensibly because he committed some military blunder in his regiment, though everybody knows his father is keeping him from Xenia.

When he has been tamed by solitude, one of the ducal household is to organize orgies in the city's night haunts. But Gabriel tells his mother that nothing will make him forget his dear Xenia and that he means to marry her, even if he has to wait years. Those who know him say he is capable of pretending indifference and running off to church with Xenia as soon as parental vigilance is relaxed. His infatuation remains a "nine-day wonder" at court. All efforts, parental and otherwise, to chaff or bully him out of it having been of no avail, an investigation into his sanity is being considered.

HAPPENINGS IN THE CITIES

Why Only Eleven Jurors Determined a Suit.

JUDGE
IT'S THIS-A-WAY - JUDGE - I - 'HEM - AH - I WAS GOIN' TO GET M-M-MARRIED !!!

BIRMINGHAM, Ala.—Eleven jurors sat and determined a damage suit the other day in the third division of the city court, notwithstanding the fact that in accordance with the custom of time immemorial, 12 men good and true had been selected.

The jury of 12 was selected and empaneled. Previous to going into the case Judge Walker declared a recess of five minutes to give the attorneys an opportunity to prepare certain papers. As the judge stepped from the rostrum he was approached by a youthful looking juror, with a decidedly troubled look on his countenance, who asked to be excused from serving on the jury just selected.

"What is the matter," queried his honor; are you sick?"

"Well, not exactly, judge, but I will be if I have to serve on that jury."

"What objection have you to the jury?"

"Judge, it's like this, I have a most important engagement tomorrow morning and in the event that the jury got tied up in the case about to be tried I would be in an awful fix."

"What kind of an engagement?"

The young fellow blushed like a school girl and said:

"I am to be married in the morning."

Judge Walker gave a sympathetic smile, and calling the opposing counsel stated the young man's predicament and plea. The learned attorney promptly decided in favor of Cupid and agreed to dispense with the services of the near-benedict and to try the case with the remaining 11 jurors.

The cloud lifted from the young man's brow, he thanked the gentlemen for their kindness and consideration, and after receiving the congratulations of the court, the attorneys and his fellow jurors, he left the courtroom with a happy smile on his now beaming countenance.

Comedy of Errors in Mix-Up of Baby and Dog

CHICAGO—This story has to deal with a baby, a dog, and their respective and loving owners, a Clark-Devon street car, and a typical returning-home-from-work crowd. It happened on the north side, between Madison street and Belmont avenue.

The woman with the dog was a good natured, friendly sort, even if she had taken advantage of the conductor by smuggling her four footed friend aboard under the guise of a package under one of the folds of her dress.

Shortly afterward a tired looking mother carrying an armful of baby passed up her nickel to the conductor and got the right to stand in the car. This situation continued until the owner of the pup developed a streak of sympathy and offered to hold the baby for the tired woman, but let the mother continue to stand.

Along about Wrightwood avenue the woman owning the dog happened to look out and see that she was passing her stopping place. She jumped to her feet, still holding the other woman's baby, nearly overturned half a dozen persons on her way to the door, and jumped off, leaving her dog behind.

YOU LITTLE DEAR—KISS MUZZER ITTE !!!

The mother of the baby did not miss the little one or notice the departure of the friendly woman until the car had gone another two blocks. Then she let out a whoop that startled the most blase "pay-as-you-enters" and dropped to the street. In the excitement she had picked up the dog.

Meanwhile the woman with the baby had gone into a drug store to find some means of calling up the car barns to locate the car, restore the baby to its mother, and secure her dog. This comedy of errors continued for more than an hour before there came a happy reunion of baby and mother and the dog and owner.

One-Armed Burglar is Only Content in Jail

I CAN'T GET ME BRE'TH !!
COME ON ALONG—

DETROIT, MICH.—The fact that Joseph Murphy has but one arm does not handicap him in his life of crime. He has a police record covering so many pages in the identification bureau of the police department that the detectives shudder even at the thought of Murphy having two arms.

The reason that "One-Armed" Murphy has not been appearing in court with his old-time frequency is because the warden of Jackson prison would not let him. A few weeks ago the steel-girded gates opened and Murphy again had his freedom. He returned to Detroit.

A Hunt street patrolman, off duty and without his revolver or handcuffs, encountered a mild mannered one-armed man in his back yard one day a short time ago. The intruder thrust a revolver in his face, at the same time saying that he was not "doing anything." He backed away, still holding the pistol in a threatening manner.

But it was different when Motorcycle Patrolman Danielski and Patrolman Teube of the Chene street police station were called to the home of a citizen and arrived in time to see a one-armed man emerging from a ground floor window. The one-armed one drew a revolver and fired several times at the policemen. He then started to run down the street, putting up an exhibition that would have done credit to Tom Longboat. He was caught and locked up in the Chene street station.

Murphy's criminal career began when he was 17 years old. He is 48 years old and says that he is only content when in jail.

S. P. C. A. Woman Called It Cruelty to Fleas

ASBURY PARK, N. J.—Nate Brahn was giving a performance of his trained fleas the other day at Third avenue and Kingsley street.

An excited woman, breathing hard and her face flushed with heat and anger pushed her way forward. She was followed by a man, just as excited as she was and just as angry.

The woman was Mrs. Percy B. Wilcox, secretary and manager of the Society for Prevention of Cruelty to Animals, and the man with her was Frank Thompson, one of the society's agents.

They watched the proud Brahn make his pets walk wires, wrestle, pull diminutive wagons and they exclaimed at the cruelty of the performance.

The S. P. C. A. representatives had been told that Brahn had spurred on his pets by the use of electricity. This was found to be untrue, but it was agreed by the representatives of the society that the fleas were suffering tortures. [illegible]

"Me cruel to my pets!" said Brahn.

YOU'RE A CRUEL IN-HUMAN MAN— !!!!

"I love them, and if there is any cruelty I am the victim. Don't I feed 'em with my own red blood? I'd show you right now how I feed 'em except I'm so mad my blood is boiling, and I don't want to scald their throats. Me cruel to my pets?

"Besides, whose business is it? Fleas ain't animals. If there's a society round these diggin's for the prevention of cruelty to trained fleas I'll show their agents that my fleas are the best fed fleas in America."

However, somebody had reported to Mayor Reginald Bennet that Brahn was mistreating fleas in Asbury Park and the mayor has placed the matter in the hands of the animal society representatives.

PEONIES AND WILD ROSES.

The modest Quaker beauties, the wild roses, fill the woods and the gorgeous queens of Sheba, the peonies, the gardens. On old-fashioned lawns, when the cultivation of pinks and pansies, hollyhocks and morning glories almost exhausted the horticultural knowledge and experience, the peony came as some Nell Gwynn, triumphant in satins, flush with beauty, and radiant in health, to startle the serenity of a proper and decorous community—as if she stepped suddenly into the quiet of the place, laughing, and did not know that wondering eyes were peering through the blinds from all the houses along the streets. She did not come as a Madame Pompadour, fascinating, but dangerous, nor wonderful, but sinister, like a princess of the Borgias, nor poppylike, a drugged beauty, but wholesome even if a king's favorite. And precise places drew back a bit as if this radiant thing were apt to overpower well schooled senses and send sedate old gentlemen into inconsiderate courses after blameless lives, says the Chicago Tribune. It was too gorgeous arising by the demure pansy and sweet-scented pink. To greater horticultural sophistication the peony now comes like a laughing, robust maid with arms akimbo, with a complexion of marvelous red and white. She would not languish in a drawing-room with perfumes and sweets, but must be out in the sunlight.

The other day a steamship from Glasgow arrived at New York with a passenger list of sixty people, one-half of whom were young women engaged to be married. Thirty young men—their prospective bridegrooms—were waiting at the pier to receive them. There are those who look upon the incident as a blow to native industry. American legislators have been busy protecting home products of many kinds. There are laws on the statute books forbidding the importation of contract labor. Home-grown potatoes are protected, but there is no law guarding the home-grown girl from foreign competition by forbidding the importation of contract brides. The marriage market in America is open to all the world. So far no voice has been raised in protest against this anomalous state of things. Perhaps it is because young marriageable American women are unorganized and without a vote. Perhaps it is because they do not fear competition.

Surely the science of chemistry has made long strides since the days of Paracelsus, when men can analyze elements at a distance of ninety-five millions of miles and undertake to pronounce upon the characteristics of a form of matter which so far has not been encountered on earth, but has been discovered to exist in the sun. Prof. J. N. Nicholson of the British Royal Astronomical society, says there is reason to believe the spectrum is now revealing in the corona of the sun a more elementary form of matter than any yet discovered on the earth. It is proposed to call this elementary substance "nebulium." Professor Nicholson says the spectrum of the far-distant nebulae in the depths of space indicates that they are composed of this same "nebulium," which is coming to light in the solar radiations. "Nebulium" is considered as being a lighter gas than hydrogen.

An instance of the composition of the death lists from heat was afforded in a report from Chicago concerning the mortality. Some specifications were given concerning ten deaths. Of those three were drowned, two had necks broken from falls, one man cut his throat, another fell from a building, an infant, four days old, died without medical attention and two dropped dead, both being inside of buildings when the fatal stroke came. This way of manufacturing heat mortality lists would be humorous if it were not so likely to be injurious.

EX-SEN. WM. D. WASHBURN PASSES AWAY

Grand Old Man of Northwest is Dead.

DEATH COMES EIGHT DAYS AFTER RACE FROM EUROPE TO REACH "FAIR OAKS."

Prominent in All Walks of Life.

Able to See Family Dwelling Again—lapses into Coma After Bidding Wife Farewell.

Minneapolis.—William Drew Washburn, former United States senator from Minnesota and pioneer miller, lumberman and railway builder, is dead at "Fair Oaks," his Minneapolis home. Death was attributed to ailments due to old age superinduced by a cancerous growth on his left side He was 81 years old.

For 36 hours Mr. Washburn lay in an unconscious state prior to his death. He died without recognizing the members of his family, who were present, excepting Stanley Washburn, a son. Stanley is still in the mountains of British Columbia, it is presumed, as no communication has been received from him.

The former senator's death came after a suspense of eight days following his arrival home from Europe on Sunday, July 21, during which no hope has been held out for his recovery. Doctors said the man's remarkable vitality had prolonged his life for almost a week longer than they had expected.

While making the journey from Quebec to Minneapolis, Mr. Washburn began to sink rapidly. He had expressed a wish to die at "Fair Oaks." E. C. Washburn, who had joined his parents in Canada telegraphed to W. D. Washburn, Jr., telling him of his father's request. Arrangments were made for a special train to bring the former senator to Minneapolis over the Minneapolis, St. Paul and Sault Ste. Marie railroad, which Mr. Washburn himself had founded.

During the last eight days, the former senator has been unconscious a greater part of the time. He rallied for a day or two and talked with old friends, who had waited at his home anxiously to hear from his bedside. He inquired about current events and when told of the sympathy his many friends held to him, he seemed overjoyed.

At the senator's bedside, besides his widow were C. E. Washburn, Mr. and Mrs. William D. Washburn, Jr., of Minneapolis, Cadwallader Washburn of Mexico City, Mexico; Mr. and Mrs. Albert Baldwin of Lakewood, N. J., Mr. and Mrs. Hamilton Wright of Washington, D. C., and Mrs. Stanley Washburn. Mrs. Baldwin and Mrs. Wright are daughters.

Mr. Washburn, known best throughout much of his long residence in Minneapolis as "General" and "Senator," had been one of the pioneer builders of the city.

Stricken Ill in Europe.

Mr. Washburn was taken ill at Carlsbad and consulted physicians there. They advised him to hasten home. He and his wife went immediately to England and sailed on a steamer over the shorter northern route for Quebec.

Mr. Washburn called for his wife Sunday afternoon after having rallied from a severe sinking spell. He talked with her a few moments and fell into a sleep from which he never awakened.

Mr. Washburn's official and political relations had been varied and important, culminating in the highest official position below the presidency, in the nation—that of senator of the United States. He had a taste for politics like all his brothers and belonged the radical wing of the Republican party. Strongly anti-slavery in the ante bellum days, when that was an engrossing political question, strenuous for the rights of the freemen, he yet tempered his sympathies by a regard for practical statesmanship. He was a protectionist in theory, and yet recognised the need of practical views in the arrangement of tariff schedules. In short he subordinated strong sympathetic impulses to practical measures in statesmanship.

As early as 1858 he was elected to the lower house of the Minnesota legislature, but the members elected that year never took their seats owing to a change of apportionment. In 1870 he was again elected to the same position and served through the important session of 1871, giving his influence and vote in favor of subjecting the railroads to public authority. He served on the school board of Minneapolis for two terms beginning with 1866.

Mr. Washburn reached Minneapolis May 1, 1857, and soon opened a law office. His career in the west divides itself into three lines, that of business, the promotion of works of public improvements, and statesmanship, in each of which he was eminent. The first two occupied the first 20 years of his residence here.

The practice of law at that period in this part of the country was meagre. It consisted chiefly of land cases, and its forum was more in the land office than in the courts. It furnished little to satisfy an eager and ambitious temper.

The Minneapolis Mill company had been charted the year before his arrival. The property of the corporation consisted of land adjacent to the falls on the west side of the Mississippi river, and was capitalized at $150,000. The means necessary to make improvements were by the plan adopted by the company to be provided by assessments upon the stock. Soon after his arrival here Mr. Washburn accepted the appointment of secretary and agent of the company. The dam was built and other improvements commenced under his management. Robert Smith, a member of congress from Alton, Ill., district, was the largest stockholder. Others were D. Morrison, the brother of Mr. Washburn, Cadwallader, Leonard Day, Jacob E. Elliot, George E. Huy, M. L. Olds, and two or three non-residence.

The financial panic of 1857 was felt with great severity towards the close of the year and checked most and wrecked some promising enterprises. The mill company was able to complete its dam and a small section of its canal so as to admit the erection of saw mills and some other manufactories, but was left with a load of debt and many unpaid stock assessments. The agent struggled with the increasing embarrassments, sometimes unable to pay the taxes upon the property, and administered its affairs for four years, during which he secured in addition to saw mills, the erection of the first merchant flour mills the Cataract.

With great labor he made turns, giving orders on stores, receiving logs and lumber, and trying in every way to use the slender resources at his command. Many stockholders, either unable to pay assessments or discouraged with the prospect of carrying an enterprise the profits of which were to be gained in the distant future, allowed their stock to be forfeited and sold. He realized the importance of having the water powers put to use, and offered liberal terms to attract buyers, so most manufacturing enterprises located while that on the east side, held at higher prices, thought in fact better sites, remained comparatively unimproved. Still the struggle was a hard one. Improvements return income for many years.

Prior to 1861, Mr. Washburn's name and influence was connected with whatever was undertaken by the citizens to advance the interests of the community. He was president of the board of trade, and corresponding secretary of the Union Commercial association. Upon the submission of the constitutional amendment porposing a loan of the credit of the state to railroad corporation commonly called the "Five Million Loan Bill," he took an active part in opposing the measure, but was overborne by the tide of popular enthusiasm raised in favor of the measure.

Mr. Washburn also engaged largely in the manufacture of flour. Associated with Rufus S. Stevens and Leonard Day, he was interested in building and operating the Palisade flouring mill at Minneapolis, built in 1873, and as W. D. Washburn & Co., built a flouring mill at Anoka in 1880. His business interests in 1884 were incorporated as the Washburn Mill Company. These lines of business were carried on until 1889 when the lumber business was closed and the flouring business with the mills was transferred to the new company that acquired the mill company under the style of Pillsbury-Washburn Flour Mills company.

The Soo road was the conception of the Washburn family. The Northern Pacific through Minnesota was also a Washburn enterprise.

In 1878 Mr. Washburn was elected to congress, carrying the district by some 3,000 majority. He was re-elected in 1880 by 12,000 majority, and again in 1882, serving three consecutive terms. He was an influential and much respected member. Through his influence the government erected the present postoffice building and undertook the system of reservoirs at the sources of the Mississipp river.

SHOTS FIRED ACROSS BORDER

AMERICAN HOMES IN EL PASO ARE STRUCK BY BULLETS.

Patrol on Texas Side Exchanges Fifty Shots With Unseen Marksmen—Houses Struck.

El Paso, Texas, Aug. 5. — Mexican rebels and United States soldiers exchanged more than fifty shots across the border in East El Paso, and the homes of five Americans in El Paso were struck by Mexican bullets.

Rebels opened fire upon the American soldiers on patrol duty near the El Paso foundry in the darkness, and the Americans returned the fire, shooting in the direction from which the Mexican shots had come.

No Americans were injured, and it is not known if any Mexicans were struck, as neither side could see the other.

Three bullets from the Mexican side struck the home of C. H. Cole and the homes of A. D. Martinez, and Messrs. Curties, Williams and Yonkers, were also struck by bullets, but no one in them was injured. Cole's daughter was ill in his house, and the excitement threw her into a serious condition.

The battle attracted state rangers and a sheriff's posse to the scene, and the river was searched from the American side, but the rebels escaped. The affair has been reported to Colonel E. Z. Steever, commanding the American troops here and an official investigation is being made.

It is believed the shooting was started by rebels to occupy the attention of the river patrol so that ammunition might be smuggled across the river.

REMEDIES FOR RHEUMATISM

Are Many but the Important Thing Is to Enrich the Blood and Cleanse the System of Rheumatic Poison.

There are many remedies for rheumatism. Most of them are considered successful if they relieve the pain and stiffness. That means a temporary suppression of the symptoms while the disease remains in the blood to appear again on the next rainy day.

Mrs. J. W. Rapp, of R. F. D. No. 1, South Omaha, Neb., says: "Several years ago I was a sufferer from rheumatism, which followed a general run-down condition and exposure to wet and dampness. The pains started in my hands, which had a sort of pricking sensation like needles were being thrust into them. As the disease grew worse the joints of my fingers became affected. They were swollen and were so painful that I could hardly bear it. Gradually the disease began to affect my limbs in the same manner. They became terribly swollen and I had to give up my work. The pains then spread all over my body and were sharp and shooting. They would suddenly shift from one part of the body to another but fortunately did not seem to affect my heart. For three months I was propped up in a chair and had to be waited on. I could not get any sleep and was losing flesh all of the time. The doctor treated me a long time but did not give much relief as the pains were as severe as ever when I quit taking his medicine. Dr. Williams' Pink Pills for Pale People were brought to my notice while reading a booklet and I made up my mind to give them a trial. A wonderful change came over me as soon as I commenced using the pills. They absolutely cured me from the terrible rheumatic pains and I have never had them since. I have recommended Dr. Williams' Pink Pills for Pale People to many persons and always explain that they cannot help giving benefit as they are a blood medicine."

A new edition of our booklet, "Diseases of the Blood," will be sent free on request to anyone interested. Write for it today.

Dr. Williams' Pink Pills are sold by all druggists, or will be sent, postpaid, on receipt of price, 50c. per box; six boxes for $2.50, by the Dr. Williams Medicine Company, Schenectady, N. Y.

MR. TAFT ACCEPTS THE NOMINATION

President's Speech to Senator Root and His Committee.

CAMPAIGN ISSUES DEFINED

Achiavamants of the Rapublican Party in This and Previous Administrationa Laudad—Agitation by Democrsts and Progressivea is Denounced.

Washington, Aug. 1.—President Taft today was formally notified of bis nomination by the Repnblican convaution in Chicago, and formelly accepted the honor. The committee, headed hy Ssnator Root, called on tho president at the White House. Mr. Taft's speech of acceptance was carefully prepared for uss as a campaign document. It was in part as follows:

Mr. Root and Gentiemement of the Notification Committae:

I accept the nomination wbich you tender. I do so with profound gratitude to the Republican party, which has thus hooored me twice. I accept it as an approval of wbst I bave done under its mandate, and as an expression of confideoco that in a second administration I will sorve tbe publio weli. The issuo preseoted to the convention, over which your chnirman presided with such a just and even haod, made a crisis in the party's life. A factioo sought to force the party to violata a valuahie aod timehonored national tradition hy entrusting tho power of tha presidency for more than two terms to one man, and that mao, ooo whose recently avowed political views would have committed the party to redical proposals involving daogorous changes in our present constitutional form of rapresentative government and our independent judiciary.

Achiavamanta of tha Party.

This occasion is appropriate for the expression of profound gratitude at the victory for the right wbicb was won at Chicago. By that victory, the Republican party was saved for future usefulness. It has been tbe party through wbicb substantially all the progress and development in our country's history in the last fifty years has heen finally effocted. It carried the country throngb the war whicb seved tbe Union, and through the greenback and silvar crazes to a sound gold basis, wbich saved the country's bonor and credit. It fought tho Spanisb war and snccessfully solved the naw problsms of our island possossions. It met tha incidental evils of the anormous trada expansion aod extended combinations of capital from 1897 until now hy a successful crusade sgeinst the attempt of concentrated wealth to control the country's politics and its trada. It enacted regulatory legislation to make the railroads the servants and not the masters of the peopla. It has enforced the enti-trust laws nntil those who were not content with anything but monopolistio control of various branches of industry sra now acquiescent in any plan which sball give them scopa for legitimate expansion and assure tbem immunity from reckless prosecntion.

Tbe list of legislative enactments for the uplifting of those of our peoplo sufferiog a disadvantage in their sociel aod economic relation to others enacted hy tha Rspnhlican party in this and provious edministrations is a long one, and shows tha party sensitivo to the needs of tha people under the new view of governmental responsibility.

Publio Mind Inflamsd.

After mentioning in some detail these enactments under the Repuhlican administrations, Mr. Taft continaed:

In the work of rousing the people to tho danger thet threatened our civilizetion from tha ehuses of concentrated wealth and the power it was likely to exercise, the public imagination was wrought npon and a reign of sensational journalism and unjust and unprincipled mnckraking has followed, in which mnch injustica has hean dona to honest men. Demagogues hava seized tha opportunity furthar to inflame tha puhlio mind and have sougbt to turn the peculiar conditions to thsir advantage.

We ara living in an age in which by axaggsration of the defecta of our present condition, by false charges of responsihility for it against individuels and classes, by holding up to the feverish imagination of the less fortunate and tha discontented the possihilities of a milisnnium, a condition of popnlar unrest has been produced. New parties are being formed, with the proposed purpose of satisfying thia unrest by promising a panacea. In so far as inequality of condition can be lessened and equality of opportunity can be promoted by improvement of our educational system, the betterment of the laws to insure the quick administration of justice, and by the prevention of the acquisition of privilege without just compensation, in so far as the adoption of the legislation above recited and laws of a similar character may aid the less fortunate in their struggle with the hardships of life, all are in sympathy with a continued effort to remedy injustice and to aid the weak, and I venture to say that there is no national administration in which [illegible] than in the present one. But in so far as the propaganda for the satisfaction of unrest involves the promise of a millennium, a condition in which tha rich are to be made reasonably poor and the poor reasonably rich by the law, we are chasing a phantom; we are holding ont to those whose unrest wa fear a prospect and a dream, a vision of the impossible.

Looks Like Socialism.

In the ultimate analysis, I fear, the equal opportunity which thosa seek who proclaim the coming of so-called social justice involves a forced division of property, and that means socialism. In the ahnses of the last two decades it is trua that ill-gotten wealth has heen concentrated in soms undeserving bands, and that if it wera possibla to redistribnte it on any aquitable principle to those from whom it was taken without adequate or proper compensation it would he a good result to bring about. But this is obviously impossihla and impracticahle. All that can he dons is to treat this as one incidental evil of a great expensiva movement in ths material progress of the world and to maka sure that there will ha no recurrence of such avil.

In this regard we bave made great progress and reform, as in respect to secret rehates in railweys, the improper conferring of public francbises, and the immunity of monopolizlog trusts and combinations. The misfortunes of ordinsry husiness, the division of tbe estates of weaithy men at their death, ths chaoces of speculation wbicb undue good fortuoe seems often to stimulate, operating as causes through a generation, will do mucb to divide up such lerge fortunes. It is far better to nwnit the elimination of this evil by nnturai causes than to sttempt what would sooo take on tha aspect of confiscation or to abolish the principle and institution of private property and to change to socialism. Socialism involves the taking nway of the motive for acquisition, saving, energy, and enterprise, and a futile ettempt hy committees to epportion the rewards due for productive labor. It means stagnation and retrogression. It destroys the mainspring ol human ection tbat bas carried the world on and upward for 2,000 years.

Opponants Offer No Remady.

I do not sey that the two gentlemen who now lead, one ths Democratic party and tbe other the former Republicans who bave left tbeir party, in their attacks npon existing conditions, and in their attempt to satisfy the popular unrest hy promises of remedies, are consciously embracing socialism. The truth is thet they do not offer any definite legislation or policy hy which the happy conditions they promise are to he hrought about, hut if their promises mean anything, they lead directly toward the appropriation of what helongs to one man, to another. The truth is, my friends, both those who heve left the Republican party under the inspiration of their present leader, and onr old opponents, tha Democrats, under their candidate, are going in a direction they do not definitely know, toward an end they can not definitely describe, with bnt one chief and clear object, and that is of acquiring power for their party by popular snpport through the promise of e change for the better. What tbey clamor for is a change. They ask for a change in government so that the government may he restored to the people, as if this hsd not been a peopls's government since the beginning of ths constitntion. I have the fullest sympathy with every reform in governmental and election machinery which shall facilitate tha expression of tbe popular will as the short ballot and tbe rednction in slective offices to make it possihle. Bnt tbese gentlemen propose to reform the government, whose present defecta, if any, are due to the failure of the peopia to devote as much time as is necessary to their political duties, hy requiring a political activity by the people thrse times that wbich thus far the people have heen willing to assume; and thns they propose remediea which, instead of exciting the peopla to fnrthar interest and activity in the government, will tire them into such en indiffarenca as still further to remand control of publio affairs to a minority.

Hostility to Judiciary.

Instead of giving us the henefit of any specific ramedies for tha bardships and evils of society they point ont, thay follow thair urgent appeals for closar association of tha people in legislation hy an attempt to cultivata the bostility of the people to the courts and to represent that they are in some form npbolding injustice and are obstructing the popular will. Attempts are made to take away all those safeguards for maintaining the indapendence of the judiciary which are so carefully framed in our constitution. These attempts find expression in tha policy, on tha one hand, of the recall of judges, a system under whicb a judge whose decision in one case may temporarily displease the electorata is to be deprived at once of his office by a popular vote, a pernicious system embodied in the Arizona constitution and which the Democrats of the house and senate refused to condemn as the initial policy of a new state. The same spirit manifested itself in the vote by Democratic senators on the proposition, first, to abolish the commerce court, and, second, to abolish judges by mere act of repeal, although under the constitution their terms are for life, on no ground except that they did not like some of the court's recent decisions.

Another form of hostility to the [illegible] for a recall of decisions, so that a decision on a point of constitutional law having been rendered by the highest court capable of rendering it, shall then be submitted to popular vote to determine whether it ought to be sustained.

Again, the Democratic party in congress and convention showe its desire to weaken the conrts by forbidding the use of the writ of injunction to protect a lawful business against the destruotive effect of a secondary boycott and hy interposing a jnry in contempt proceedings brongbt to enforce its order and decrees. These provisions are really olass legislation designed to secure immunity for lewlessness in labor dispntes on the part of the laborers, but operating mnoh more widely to paralyze the arm of the conrt in cases which do not involve labor disputes at all. The hostility to tha judiciary and tha measures to take away its power and its independence constituta the chief definite policy that can he fairly attributed to thet class of statesmen and reformsrs whose ahsorption and control the Repnhlican party escaped at Chicago and the Democratic perty yielded to at Baltimore.

Such Innovations Rejected.

Tha Republican party, Mr. Taft continued, stands for none of these innovations. It refnses to maka changes simply for tbe purpose of makiog a cbange, and cultivating populsr bope that in the change something heneficial, undefined, will take place. The Repnhlican party helieves in progress along tbe lines upon wbicb we have attained progress already.

The president then devoted some time to a review of what has heen accomplished during bis edministration, including e warm defense of the Payne tariff bill. In conclusion he said:

I can not think that the American people, after the scrutiny and education of a three-months' campaign, during wbich tbey will he ahle to see througb the fog of misrepresentation and demagoguery, will fail to recognize that the two great issues which are here presented to them are, first, wbether we shall retain, on a sonnd and permanent hasis, our popnlar constitutional representative form of government, with the independence of the jndiciary as a necessary key to the preservation of those liberties that are the inheritance of 1,000 yeare, end, second, whether we shall welcome prosperity which is just at our door hy maintaining our present economic husiness basis and hy ths encouragement of husiness expansion and progress tbrough legitimate use of capital.

Appeal to All Consarvativss.

I know thet in this wide country there are many who call themselves Democrata, who view, with the same avsrsion that we Repuhlicans do, tba radical propositiona of chaoge in our form of government that are recklessly advanced to satisfy what is supposed to ba popular clamor. They are men who revere the constitution and the institutious of their government with all tha love and respect thet we conid possihly have, men wbo deprecate disturbance in husinass conditions, and are yearning for that quiet from demagogic agitation which is essential to the enjoyment hy the wbole people of the great prosperity which the good crops and the preeent conditions ought to bring to us. To them I appeal, as to all Republicens, to join us in an earnest effort to avert tbe politicnl and economic revolution and business paralysis whicb Republican defeat will bring abont. Such misfortune will fall most heavily on the wage earner. May we not hope thet he will see whet his real interest is, understand the shallowness of attacks upon existing institutions and deceitful promises of undefined henefits hy undefined changes?

May we not hope that the great majority of voters will he ahle to distinguish between the suhstance of performance and the fustian of promise; that thay may he ahle to see tbat those who would deliherstely stir np discontent and create hostility toward those who are condncting legitimate bnsiness enterprises, and who represent the husiness progresa of the country, are sowing dragons' teeth? Who are the peopla? They are not alona tha unfortunate and the weak; they are the weak and the atrong, the poor and the rich, and the many who are neithar, tha waga earner and tha capitalist, the farmar and the professional man, tha marchant and tbe manufacturar, the storekeeper and tha clerk, the railroad manager and tha employa—they all make up the peopla and they all contribnta to the running of the govarnment, and they heva not any of them given into the handa of anyone the mandate to speak for them as peculiarly the people'a representativa. Especially does not he represant them who, assuming that the peopla are the unfortunate and discontented, would stir tham up against the remainder of those whose governmant alike this is. In other campaigns before this, tha American people have been confused and misled and diverted from the truth and from a clear perception of their welfare by specious appeals to thair prejudices and their misunderstanding, but the clarifying effect of a campaign of education, the pricking of the bubble of demagogic promise which the discussions of a campaign made possible, have brought the people to a clear perception of their own interests and to a rejection of the injurious nostrums that in the beginning of the campaign it was then feared they might embrace and adopt. So may we not expect in [illegible]

TELLS OF PARTY'S AIMS AND IDEALS

Speech of Senator Beveridge as Temporary Chairman of Progressive Convention.

NEW POLITICAL ERA IN SIGHT

Wiser Statesmanship and Freer Rula of the Peopla Declared to Be tha Object of ths Movement—Legitimate Business Interests Not to Bs Disturbsd.

Chicago, Aug. 5.—Senator Albert J. Beveridge of Indiana, on assuming the temporary chairmanship of the Progressive national convention, delivered the speech which la recognized es embodying the aims of the new party. His address, in effect, wes as follows:

We stand for a nohler America. We stand for an undivided netion. We stand for a broader liberty, a fuller justice. We stand for social hrothorhood as against savage individualism. We stand for an intelligent co-operation instead of a reckless competition. Wo stand for mutual helpfuiness instead of mutual hatred. We stand for equal rights as a fact of life instead of a catchword of potitics. We stand for the rule of the peopie as a practical truth instend of a meaningless pretense. Wo stand for a representative government that represents the peopie. We battle for the actual rights of man.

The people living in this land of gold are the most daring and resourceful on the globe. Coming from the hardiest stock of every nation of the old world their very history in the new world has made Americans a peculiar people in conrage, initiative, love of justice and all the elements of independent character.

And, compared with other peoples, we are very few in numhers. There are only ninety millions of us, scattered over a continent. Germany has sixty-five millious packed in a oountry very mnch smaller than Texas. The population of Great Britain and Ireland could he set down in California and still have more than enough room for the popniation of Holiand. If this country was as thickly populated as Belgium there would he more than twelve hnndred million instead of only ninety million persone within our borders.

As Conditions Should Be.

So we have more than enough to supply every human heing beneath the flag. There ought not to he in this republio a single day of bad husiness, a single unemployed workingman, a single unfed child. American husiness men shonid never know an hour of nncertainty, discouragement or fear; American workingmen never a dey of low wages, idieness or want. Hunger should never walk in these thinly peopled gardene of plenty.

And yet in spite of all these favors which providence hes showered npon us, the living of the people is the problem of the honr. Hundreds of thousands of hard-working Americans find it difficult to get enough to live on. The average income of an American lahorer is less than $500 a year. With this he must furnish food, shelter and clothing for a family.

Women, whose nourishing and protection should be the first care of the state, not only are driven into the mighty army of wage-earners, bnt are forced to work under unfair and degrading conditions. The right of a child to grow into a normal hûman being is sacred; and yet, while small and poor countries, packed with people, have abolished child labor, American mills, mines, factories and sweatshops are destroying hundreds of thousands of American children in hody, mind and soul.

At tha same time men have grasped fortunes in this country so great that the human mind can not comprehend thair magnitnde. These mountains of wealth are far larger than even that lavish reward which no one would deny to husiness risk or genius.

On the other hand, American business is nncertain and unsteady compared with the business of other nations. American hnsiness men are the best and bravest in the world, and yet our bnsiness conditions hamper their energies and chill their courage. We have no permanency in bnsiness affairs, no sure ontlook npon the bnsiness future. This unsettled state of American business preventa it from realising for the people that great and continnous prosperity which our country's location, vast wealth and small population justifies.

Reforms Projected.

We mean to remedy these conditions. We mean not only to make prosperity steady, btn to give to the many who earn it a jnat share of that prosperity steady, but to give to the who do not earn it to take an unjust share. The progressive motto is "Pass prosperity around." To make human living easier, to free the hands of honest business, to make trade and commerce sound and steady, to protect womanhood, save childhood and restore the dignity of manhood—these are the tasks we must do.

What, then, is the progressive answer to these questions? We are able to give it specifically and concretely. [illegible] the mine, fashion all for human use, carry them to the market place and exchange them according to their mutual needs—and this is business.

With our vast advantages, contrasted with the vast disadvantages of other nations, American business all the time should he the best and steadiest in the world. But it is not. Germany, with shallow soil, no mines, only a window on the seas and a population more then ten times as dense as ours, yet has a sounder business, a steadier prosperity, a more contented because better cared for people.

What, tben, must we do to make American husiness better? We must do what poorer nations have done. We must end the ahuses of husiness hy striking down those ahuses instead of striking down business itself.

Present Business Evils.

With the growth of hig husiness came business evils just as great. It is these evils of big husiness that hurt the people and injure all other husiness. One of these wrongs is overcapitalisation which taxes the people's very living. Another is the manipulation of pricee to the unsettlement of all normal business and to the people's damage. Another is interference in the making of the people's laws and the running of the people's government in the unjust interest of evil husiness. Getting laws tbat enable particular interests to rob the people, and even to gather criminal riches from human health and life is still another.

An example of such laws is tbe infamous tohacco legislation of 1902, wbich authorized the tobacco trust to continue to collect from the people the Spanish war tax, amounting to a score of millions of dollars, hut to keep that tax instead of turning it over to the government, as it hed heen doing. Another example is the shameful meat legislation, hy which the heef trust had the meat it sent ahroed inspected hy tbe government so that foreign countries would take its product, and yet was permitted to sell diseased meat to our own people. It is incredible that lawe like these could ever get on the nation's statute books. The invisible government put them there; end only the universal wrath of an enraged people corrected them when, after years, the people discovered the outrages.

Trust Question Vital.

The people are tired of mock hattle with criminal capital. They do not want to hurt business; hut they do want to get something done ahout the trust question that amounts to something. What good does it do any man to read in his morning paper thet the courts have "dissolved" the oil trust, and then read in his evening paper tbat he must thereafter pay a higher price for his oil than ever before? What good does it do the laborer who smokes his pipe to be told that the courts have "dissolved" the tobacco trust and yet find that he must pay the same or a higher price for the same short-weight package of tobacco? Yet all this is tbe practical result of the suits against these two greatest trusts in the world.

Rival nations tell their husiness men that if they do any evil that our business men do, prison hars await them. These rival nations tell their husiness men that if they issue watered stock, or cheat the people in any way, prison cells will be their homes.

Just this is what all honest American business wants; just this is what dishonest American business does not want; just this is what the American people propose to have; just this the platform, repudiated as it repudiated pledged the people that we would give them; and just this important pledge the administration, elected on that platform, repudiated as it repudiated the more immediate tariff pledge.

Both these reforms, so vital to honest American husiness, the Progressive party will accomplish. Neither evil interests nor reckless demagogues can swerve us from our purpose; for we are free from hoth and fear neither.

We mean to put new business laws on our statute books which will tell American business men what they can do and what they can not do. We mean to make our husiness laws clear instead of foggy—to make them plainly state just whet things are criminal and what are lawful. And we mean that the penalty for things criminal shall he prison sentences that actually punish the real offender, instead of money fines that hurt nobody hut the people, who must pay them in the end.

No Cause for Alarm to Business.

And then we mean to send the message forth to hundreds of thousands of brilliant minds and brave hearts engaged in honest business, that they are not criminals but honorable men in their work to make good business in this Republic. Sure of victory, we even now say, "Go forward, American business man, and know that behind you, supporting you, encouraging you, is the power and approval of the greatest people under the sun. Go forward, American business men, and feed full the fires beneath American furnaces; and give employment to every American laborer who asks for work. Go forward, American business men, and capture the markets of the world for American trade; and know that on the wings of your commerce you carry liberty throughout the world for American trade; and know Go forward, American business men, and realize that in the time to come it shall be said of you, as it is said of the hand that rounded Peter's Dome, 'he builded better than he knew.'"

The next great business reform we [illegible] of as a political question. Heretofore we have just done the other thing. That is why American business is upset every few years by unnecessary tariff upheavals and is weakened by uncertainty in the periods between. The greatest need of business is certainty; but the only thing certain about our tariff is uncertainty.

What, then, shall we do to make our tariff changes strengthen business instead of weakening business? Rival protective tariff nations have answered that question. Common sense has answered it. Next to our need to make the Shermen law modern, understandable and just, our greatest fiscal need is a genuine, permanent, non-partisan tariff commission.

Spoilers Threatened.

The tariff in politics is the excuse for those sham political battles which give the spoilers their opportunity. The tariff in politics is one of the invisible government's methods of wringing tribute from the people. Through the tariff in politics the beneficiaries of tariff excesses are cared for, no matter which party is "revising."

A tariff high enough to give American producers the American market when they make honest goods and sell them at honest prices but low enough that when they sell dishonest goods at dishonest prices, foreign competition can correct both evils; a tariff high enough to enable American producers to pay our workingmen American wages and so arranged than the workingmen will get such wages; a business tariff whose changes will be so made as to reassure business instead of disturbing it—this is the tariff and the method of its making in which the Progressive party believes, for which it does battle and which it proposes to write into the laws of the land.

The Payne-Aldrich tariff laws must be revised immediately in accordance to these principles. At the same time a genuine, permanent, non-partisan tariff commission must be fixed in the law as firmly as the interstate commerce commission. Neither of the old parties can do this work. For neither of the old parties believes in such a tariff; and, what is more serious, special privilege is too thoroughly woven into the fiber of both old parties to allow them to make such a tariff. The Progressive party only is free from these influences. The Progressive party only believes in the sincere enactment of a sound tariff policy. The Progressive party only can change the tariff as it must be changed.

The Progressive party believes that the Constitution is a living thing, growing with the people's growth, strengthening with the people's strength, aiding the people in their struggle for life, liberty and the pursuit of happiness, permitting the people to meet all their needs as conditions change. The opposition believes that the Constitution is a dead form, holding back the people's growth, shackling the people's strength but giving a free hand to malign powers that prey upon the people. The first words of the Constitution are "We are the people" and they declare that the Constitution's purpose is "to form a perfect Union and to promote the general welfare." To do just that is the very heart of the progressive cause.

From certain sources we hear preachments about the danger of our reforms to American institutions. What is the purpose of American institutions? Why was this Republic established? What does the flag stand for? What do these things mean?

They mean that the people shall be free to correct human abuses.

They mean that men, women and children shall not be denied the opportunity to grow stronger and nobler.

They mean that the people shall have the power to make our land each day a better place to live in.

They mean the realities of liberty and not the academics of theory.

For Actual Progress.

They mean the realities of liberty the race in tangible items of daily living and not the theoretics of barren disputation.

If they do not mean these things they are as a sounding brass and tinkling cymbal.

A nation of strong, upright men and women; a nation of wholesome homes, realizing the best ideals; a nation whose power is glorified by its justice and whose justice is the conscience of scores of millions of God fearing people—that is the nation the people need and want. And that is the nation they shall have.

For never doubt that we American will make good the real meaning of our institutions. Never doubt that we will solve, in righteousness and wisdom, every vexing problem. Never doubt, that in the end, the hand from above that leads us upward will prevail over the hand from below that that we are indeed a nation whose God is the Lord.

And, so, never doubt that a braver, fairer, cleaner America surely will come; that a better and brighter life for all beneath the flag surely will be achieved. Those who now scoff soon will pray. Those who now doubt soon will believe.

Not reluctantly then, but eagerly, not with faint hearts but strong, do we now advance upon the enemies of the people. For the call that comes to us is the call that came to our fathers. As they responded so shall we.

He hath sounded forth a trumpet that shall never call retreat,
He is sifting out the hearts of men before his judgment seat,
[illegible]
Our God is marching on.

TO LATE FOR PURPOSES.

The Search Light is the name of a new publication started at Grayslake Ills., to defend the administration of president Taft, but instead of doing it they advise him to admit that he has done wrong, lay it onto his advisers and promise not to do so anymore. In one article of advice they say:

"If Mr. Taft will now sit down and go over the errors of his administration which have alienated from him the support of people in whose hearts he has a large measure of affection, and frankly admit that he has been badly advised, that his administration has been badly generaled, and if from now on he will cease trying to play politics with the business of the country, and assume the helm himself, he will rally to the support of good government the substantial elements of the country, who do not and will not follow Bryan."

The above advise comes to late, to do Taft any good in this campaign, as he has been to bold in his crooked work, and has been fairly and squarely caught at it. Look at his appointments of Federal Judges and Goverment Engineers; Can one of them be found who does not represent the true interests and the will of the corporations and trusts? Not one! look at that goverment Engineers office at St. Paul for an example.

Last winter when the lumber companies closed off Red Lake River and deprived the people of the use of it complaint was made to our goverment engineers. What they did is history; they represented the corporations and ignored the peoples complaints. They falsified reports and sent them in to excuse the committers of this outrage, and now promise to do better. If a man had stolen a horse from you, would you be likely to give him a chance to steal another one because he had promised to do better. We think not.

His chief supporter, in this state Governor Eberhart is a chip off of the old block in this respect. When complaint was made to his game and fish commission that this river had been closed off and the fish were all dying, they promptly reported as the tools of the corporations that, "the complaint was without any foundation whatever." The fish all died and that "pot gang" held down their job, and are now supporting Eberhart to get a chance to make some more reports of that kind for the lumber companys, at so much per report.

Do they think the people are so green that they do not know these things? If they do they will find out their mistake in November. Promises don't go at this stage of the game! Over the dump you go in November, that others who are elected to an office of trust by the people may profit by their downfall, and represent the interests of all the people, instead of the corporations.

We occasionly meet a republican that is so far out of date that he is talking of supporting Taft and Eberhart. But all of them that we have seen so far live in Thief River Falls.

LaFollette is mad at Roosevelt because he did not turn in and throw his strength to him and thus place the rank and file of the Republican party in a position that would compel them to accept the nomination of Taft. In fact it now begins to look as if they were partners in the deal. The only hope to save the party now from utter route, is to swing to Roosevelt.

Having had several years experience as school clerk in District No 37 (Highlanding district), we wish to say a word about Superintendents of school from seven years experiance with them and that is this: We have never had a Superintendent of schools in Red Lake county, of which Pennington County is now a part that has given as much time and pains to the looking after the interests of the country schools as E.A. Mostue has. We do not guess at these facts, but we know them to be facts. He may not be as satisfactory to the cities and villages as same more stylish man, but he is the man that the country districts needs, and let us turn out to a man and take our wives with us to vote for his renomination and election.

James A. Peterson, the opponent of Knut Nelson, for the republican namination for U.S. Senator from Minnesota has come out with a statement indorsing Roosevelt. But it don't make much difference who any candidate for office indorses this year as it is a case of every one for himself and may the devil get the last one on.

Geo. W. Eilder.

FOR [illegible]

I [illegible] candidate for County Treasurer, subject to the [illegible] of the Republican voters at the primaries, September 17, 1912. [illegible] that political parties have always regarded it as important to have their members elected to all offices. It may be for aid in [illegible] party politics, for so far as the work in the county offices is concerned it can make no difference whatever, what the officers political affiliations are, so the idea must be that he is expected to to maintain the average of prices. While the price-level does not prove that times are good, theoretically, yet we know that with the enormous debt of the country, it will be harder to pay it with low prices than with high, steady prices. I believe that because one can not support the whole Republican ticket, it is no reason at all to quite supporting candidates for congress and the legislature, which is by far more important than the office of president, so far as party politics is concerned. These are my ideas, and I shall use my influence to help along on those lines, no matter whether I am nominated or not.

Sincerely for the success of the party.

Andrew Trovaten.

FOR SHERIFF.

I wish to announce that I am a candidate for the office of sheriff, subject to the will of the voters of Pennington county at the primaries September 17. A Surprised Ventriloquist.

"The biggest surprise I ever got in my business," said a ventriloquist, "was in England when playing at a little theater in the outskirts of London.

"When I came on the stage I threw my voice up in the rafters and inquired 'What are you doing up there?' To my surprise a small voice answered. 'I came here to see the people and hear the music.' 'Very well,' said I; 'stay there and don't let any one see you.'"

Then I bowed to the audience amid thunderous applause.—Columbus Dispatch.

The weather has been unfavorable for haying and harvest the past week.

There will be a social dance given at the residence of M. E. Hyland in Deer Park Township.

The old setting dredge, that they are running, or trying to run on ditch 47 is not doing the work according to the specifications at all, as they are dumping the dirt right beside the ditch, which of course will fall back into the ditch as soon as we have a heavy rain storm. We have the blue print of this ditch and it is a waste of time for them to think of trying to put work of that kind onto the farmers who are to pay the bills, as a protest will be promptly filed with the County Auditor to stop payment until the work is done according to contract.

Even if the primary election does come at a busy time of the year, it is the duty of the farmers to turn out and vote for the candidate of their choice, as it is poor policy for the farmers to stay at home and allow the cities and villages to choose the candidates for office for them that they are to vote for in November.

Our local column is short this week owing to our having to drive to Lillo after our bundle of papers. The mail carrier forgot, but the poor Country Editor can't forget.

Later: We discovered that it was no fault of the mail carriers but of that Agent at Plummer, who it takes from Tuesday until Friday to get time to visit that depot long enough to deliver an express package.

PERILOUS POSING.

Putting "Human Interest" in the Camera Man's Pictures.

A. W. Dimock in Outing tells of his engagement as a professional disturber of snakes, lynx, alligators, tarpon, etc., for his camera man and of a partial drowning necessary to supply the "human interest." To quote him.

"I had a coiled rattlesnake needed stirring up I shook a short stick in his face. If we caught a big 'gator or crocodile on a bank I was the one to keep between it and its home, in river or bay, and discourage with a club its advance. When our captive lynx was let out of his cage to pose it was my business to keep him busy with fish or otherwise lest he eat the camera man. I was expected to hypnotize any bird, from a tern to a turkey buzzard, while the camera man got in his work.

"Even tarpon fishing was made adventurous, and half a dozen times a day I heard the shout:

"'Can't you pull your canoe nearer the fish? I must have human interest.'

"Then I dragged on the line till the canoe was over a fish that was bigger than I, which often shot ten feet over my head, sometimes crashing into the canoe, when instead of being promptly rescued I was likely to hear the call:

"'Swim farther out, where the light is better!'"

He Would Indeed.

"What's this word, pa?" asked Willie, pointing it out in his book.

"Phenomenon," replied pa.

"Well what is that?"

"That, my son, is exactly what you would be if you never disturbed your father with questions."—Catholic Standard and Times.

Hibernation of Mosquitoes.

That cosmopolitan pest, the mosquito, does not necessarily perish with the coming of winter. On the contrary, mosquitoes have been observed to hibernate, adult specimens living from November until the succeeding April or May with all their powers of torment unimpaired, although their activity is suspended in winter. The mosquito needs but little food, and it is the female that thirsts for blood, the males contenting themselves with water and vegetable fluids. The fact that mosquitoes are often found upon dry prairies many miles from water is ascribed to the longevity of the adults of certain species which enables them to survive seasons of drought. Railroads have been responsible for the transmission of mosquitoes into regions where they were previously rare.—Harper's.

FACE A SIGHT WITH TETTER

Moberly, Mo.—"My trouble began with a small pimple on the left side of my face and it spread all over my face and to my neck. It would be scarlet red when I got warm. My face was a sight. It looked very unpleasant, and it felt uncomfortable. My face was something awful; it just kept me in agony all the time. Some said it was tetter, and some said it was that awful eczema, but I rather think it was tetter. I had been troubled with it for about two years and tried many remedies, but got no relief until I used Cuticura Soap and Ointment.

"When I would wash my face with the Cuticura Soap and apply the Cuticura Ointment it would cool my skin and draw great big drops of matter out of the skin. You would think I was sweating; it would run down my face just as though I had washed it. It itched and smarted and I suffered in the day time most. I used the Cuticura Soap and Cuticura Ointment for a month and I was cured of it." (Signed) Mrs. J. Brooksher, April 15, 1912.

SYNOPSIS.

Lieut. Harry Mallory is ordered to the Philippines. He and Marjorie Newton decide to elope, but wreck of taxicab prevents their seeing minister on the way to the train. Transcontinental train is taking on passengers. Porter has a lively time with an Englishman and Ira Lathrop, a Yankee business man. The elopers have an exciting time getting to the train. "Little Jimmie" Wellington, bound for Reno to get a divorce, boards train in maudlin condition. Later Mrs. Jimmie appears. She is also bound for Reno with same object. Likewise Mrs. Sammy Whitcomb. Latter blames Mrs. Jimmie for her marital troubles. Classmates of Mallory decorate bridal berth. Rev. and Mrs. Temple start on a vacation. They decide to cut loose and Temple removes evidence of his calling. Marjorie decides to let Mallory proceed alone, but train starts while they are lost in farewell. Passengers join Mallory's classmates in giving couple wedding hazing.

CHAPTER X—(Continued).

He sank into the seat opposite Marjorie, who gave him one terrified glance, and burst into fresh sobs:

"Oh—oh—boo-hoo—I'm so unhap—hap—py."

Perhaps Mrs. Temple was a little miffed at the couple that had led her astray and opened her own honeymoon with a wanton fib. In any case, the best consolation she could offer Marjorie was a perfunctory pat, and a cynicism:

"There, there, dear! You don't know what real unhappiness is yet. Wait till you've been married a while."

And then she noted a startling lack of completeness in the bride's hand.

"Why—my dear!—where's your wedding ring?"

With what he considered great presence of mind, Mallory explained: "It—it slipped off—I—I picked it up. I have it here." And he took the little gold band from his waistcoat and tried to jam it on Marjorie's right thumb.

"Not on the thumb!" Mrs. Temple cried. "Don't you know?"

"You see, it's my first marriage."

"You poor boy—this finger!" And Mrs. Temple, raising Marjorie's limp hand, selected the proper digit, and held it forward, while Mallory pressed the fatal circlet home.

And then Mrs. Temple, having completed their installation as man and wife, utterly confounded their confusion by her final effort at comfort: "Well, my dears, I'll go back to my seat, and leave you alone with your dear husband."

"My dear what?" Marjorie mumbled inanely, and began to sniffle again. Whereupon Mrs. Temple resigned her to Mallory, and consigned her to fate with a consoling platitude:

"Cheer up, my dear, you'll be all right in the morning."

Marjorie and Mallory's eyes met in one wild clash, and then both stared into the window, and did not notice that the shades were down.

CHAPTER XI.

A Chance Encounter.

While Mrs. Temple was confiding to her husband that the agitated couple in the next seat had just come from a wedding-factory, and had got on while he was lost in tobacco land, the people in the seat on the other side of them were engaged in a little drama of their own.

Ira Lathrop, known to all who knew him as a woman-hating snapping-turtle, was so busily engaged trying to drag the farthest invading rice grains out of the back of his neck, that he was late in realizing his whereabouts. When he raised his head, he found that he had crowded into a seat with an uncomfortable looking woman, who crowded against the window with old-maidenly timidity.

He felt some apology to be necessary, and he snarled: "Disgusting things, these weddings!" After he heard this, it did not sound entirely felicitous, so he grudgingly ventured: "Excuse me—you married?"

She denied the soft impeachment so heartily that he softened a little:

"You're a sensible woman. I guess you and I are the only sensible people on this train."

"It—seems—so," she giggled. It was the first time her spinstership had been taken as material for a compliment. Something in the girlish giggle and the strangely young smile that swept twenty years from her face and belied the silver lines in her hair, seemed to catch the old bachelor's attention. He stared at her so fiercely that she looked about for a way to escape. Then a curiously anxious, almost a hungry, look softened his leonine jowls into a boyish eagerness, and his growl became a sort of gruff purr:

"Say, you look something like an old sweetheart—or—friend—of mine. Were you ever in Brattleboro, Vt.?"

A flush warmed her cheek, and a sense of home warmed her prim [illegible] as she confessed:

[illegible] came from there originally."

"So did I," said Ira Lathrop, leaning closer, and beaming like a big sun: "I don't suppose you remember Ira Lathrop?"

The old maid stared at the bachelor as if she were trying to see the boy she had known, through the mask that time had modeled on his face. And then she was a girl again, and her voice chimed as she cried:

"Why, Ira!—Mr. Lathrop!—is it you?"

She gave him her hand—both her hands, and he smothered them in one big paw and laid the other on for extra warmth, as he nodded his savage head and roared as gentle as a sucking dove:

"Well, well! Annie—Anne—Miss Gattle! What do you think of that?"

They gossiped across the chasm of years about people and things, and knew nothing of the excitement so close to them, saw nothing of Chicago slipping back into the distance, with its many lights shooting across the windows like hurled torches.

Suddenly a twinge of ancient jealousy shot through the man's heart, recurring to old emotions.

"So you're not married, Annie. Whatever became of that fellow who used to hang round you all the time?"

"Charlie Selby?" She blushed at the name, and thrilled at the luxury of meeting jealousy. "Oh, he entered the church. He's a minister out in Ogden, Utah."

"I always knew he'd never amount to much," was Lathrop's epitaph on his old rival. Then he started with a new twinge: "You bound for Ogden, too?"

"Oh, no," she smiled, enraptured at the new sensation of making a man anxious, and understanding all in a flash the motives that make coquettes. Then she told him her destination. "I'm on my way to China."

"China!" he exclaimed. "So'm I!"

She stared at him with a new thought, and gushed: "Oh, Ira—are you a missionary, too?"

"Missionary? Hell, no!" he roared. "Excuse me—I'm an importer—Anne, I—I—"

But the sonorous swear reverberated in their ears like a smitten bell, and he blushed for it, but could not recall it.

CHAPTER XII.

The Needle in the Haystack.

The almost-married couple sat long in mutual terror and a common paralysis of ingenuity. Marjorie, for lack of anything better to do, was absent-mindedly twisting Snoozleum's ears, while he, that pocket abridgment of a dog, in a well meaning effort to divert her from her evident grief, made a great pretense of ferocity, growling and threatening to bite her fingers off. The new ring attracted his special jealousy. He was growing discouraged at the ill-success of his impersonation of a wolf, and dejected at being so crassly ignored, when he suddenly became, in his turn, a center of interest.

Marjorie was awakened from her trance of inanition by the porter's voice. His plantation voice was ordinarily as thick and sweet as his own New Orleans sorghum, but now it had a bitterness that curdled the blood:

"'Scuse me, but how did you-all git that theah dog in this heah cah?"

"Snoozleums is always with me," said Marjorie briskly, as if that settled it, and turned for confirmation to the dog himself, "aren't you, Snoozleums?"

"Well," the porter drawled, trying to be gracious with his great power, "the rules don't 'low no live stock in tha sleepin' cars, 'ceptin' humans."

Marjorie rewarded his condescension with a blunt: "Snoozleums is more human than you are."

"I p'sume he is," the porter admitted, "but he can't make up berths. Anyway, the rules says dogs goes with the baggage."

Marjorie swept rules aside with a defiant: "I don't care. I won't be separated from my Snoozleums."

She looked to Mallory for support, but he was too sorely troubled with greater anxieties to be capable of any action.

The porter tried persuasion: "You betta lemme take him, the conducta is wuss'n what I am. He th'owed a couple of dogs out the window trip befo' last."

"The brute!"

"Oh, yassum, he is a regulah brute. He just loves to hear 'm splosh when they light."

Noting the shiver that shook the girl, the porter offered a bit of consolation:

"Better lemme have the pore little thing up in the baggage cah. He'll be in charge of a lovely baggage-smasher."

"Are you sure he's a nice man?"

"Oh, yassum, he's death on trunks, but he's a natural born angel to dogs."

"Well, if I must, I must," she sobbed. "Poor little Snoozleums! Can he come back and see me tomorrow?" Marjorie's tears were splashing on the puzzled dog, who nestled close, with a foreboding of disaster.

"I reckon p'haps you'd better visit him."

"Poor dear little Snoozleums—good night, my little darling. Poor little child—it's the first night he's slept all by his 'little lonesome, and—"

The porter was growing desperate. He clapped his hands together impatiently and urged: "I think I hear that conducta comin'."

The ruse succeeded. Marjorie fairly forced the dog on him. "Quick—hide him—hurry!" she gasped, and sank on the seat, completely crushed. "I'll be so lonesome without Snoozleums—" [illegible]

[illegible] Marjorie [illegible] looked at him just once—at him, the source of all her troubles—buried her head in her arms, and resumed her grief. Mallory stared at her helplessly, then rose and bent over to whisper:

"I'm going to look through the train."

"Oh, don't leave me," she pleaded, clinging to him with a dependence that restored his respect.

"I must find a clergyman," he whispered. "I'll be back the minute I find one, and I'll bring him with me."

The porter thought he wanted the dog back, and quickened his pace till he reached the corridor, where Mallory overtook him and asked, in an effort at casual indifference, if he had seen anything of a clergyman on board.

"Ain't seen nothin' that even looks like one," said the porter. Then he hastened ahead to the baggage car with the squirming Snoozleums, while Mallory followed slowly, going from seat to seat and car to car, subjecting all the males to an inspection that rendered some of them indignant, others of them uneasy.

If dear old Doctor Temple could only have known what Mallory was hunting, he would have snatched off the mask, and thrown aside the secular scarlet tie at all costs. But poor Mallory, unable to recognize a clergyman so dyed-in-the-wool as Doctor Temple, sitting in the very next seat—how could he be expected to pick out another in the long and crowded train?

All clergymen look alike when they are in convention assembled, but sprinkled through a crowd they are not so easily distinguished.

In the sleeping car bound for Portland, Mallory picked one man as a clergyman. He had a lean, ascetic face, solemn eyes, and he was talking to his seat-mate in an oratorical manner. Mallory bent down and tapped the man's shoulder.

The effect was surprising. The man jumped as if he were stabbed, and turned a pale, frightened face on Mallory, who murmured:

"Excuse me, do you happen to be a clergyman?"

A look of relief stole over the man's features, followed closely by a scowl of wounded vanity:

"No, damn you, I don't happen to be a parson. I have chosen to be—well, if you had watched the billboards in Chicago during our run, you would not need to ask who I am!"

Mallory mumbled an apology and hurried on, just overhearing his victim's sigh:

"Such is fame!"

He saw two or three other clerical persons in that car, but feared to touch their shoulders. One man in the last seat held him specially, and he hid in the turn of the corridor, in the hope of eavesdropping some clue. This man was bent and scholastic of appearance, and wore heavy spectacles and a heavy beard, which Mallory took for a guaranty that he was not another actor. And he was reading what appeared to be printer's proofs. Mallory felt certain that they were a volume of sermons. He lingered timorously in the environs for some time before the man spoke at all to the dreary-looking woman at his side. Then the stranger spoke. And this is what he said and read:

"I fancy this will make the bigots sit up and take notice, mother: 'If there ever was a person named Moses, it is certain, from the writings ascribed to him, that he disbelieved the Egyptian theory of a life after death, and combated it as a heathenish superstition. The Judaic idea of a future existence was undoubtedly acquired from the Assyrians, during the captivity.'"

He doubtless read much more, but Mallory fled to the next car. There he found a man in a frock coat talking solemnly to another of equal solemnity. The seat next them was unoccupied, and Mallory dropped into it, perking his ears backward for news.

"Was you ever in Moline?" one voice asked.

"Was I?" the other muttered. "Wasn't I run out of there by one of my audiences. I was givin' hypnotic demonstrations, and I had a run-in with one of my 'horses,' and he done me dirt. Right in the midst of one of his cataleptic trances, he got down from the chairs where I had stretched him out and hollered: 'He's a bum faker, gents, and owes me two weeks' pay.' Thank Gawd, there was a back door openin' on a dark alley leadin' to the switch yard. I caught a caboose just as a freight train was pullin' out."

Mallory could hardly get strength to rise and continue his search. On his way forward he met the conductor, crossing a vestibule between cars. A happy thought occurred to Mallory. He said:

"Excuse me, but have you any preachers on board?"

"None so far."

"Are you sure?"

"Positive."

"How can you tell?"

"Well, if a grown man offers me a half-fare ticket, I guess that's a pretty good sign, ain't it?"

Mallory guessed that it was, and turned back, hopeless and helpless.

Unhurt by Long Fall.

A fall from a second-story window of her house in Philadelphia did little more than jar an aged lady the other day. When members of the family reached her side they found that she had sustained only a few bruises. A doctor said no bones were broken, and that she would be about again in a day or so. She was leaning from the bathroom window when she lost her balance [illegible]

Canada Has Sufficient Coal for 6000 Years

It Has Enough Agricultural Land for the Settling of Millions.

A report dealing with the coal resources of Canada has been issued by the Dominion Department of Mines. The estimates given are only based on what is known. In the western and northern regions, which have been little explored, there may be vast deposits of which nothing whatever is known at present. The officials of the department estimate that of bituminous coal there is in Canada 73½ billion tons; of anthracite 461 million tons; sub-bituminous and lignite over 100 billion tons. The quantity of coal now annually mined in Canada is about 12 million tons. With an estimated quantity of unmixed good coal, of 74 billion tons, it would require 6,166 years to exhaust the supply. If the inferior grades were included, supply would last for 14,575 years. Of course the coal demands of Canada will keep on increasing, but it will be a good many years before the quantity of Canadian coal mined will equal present output of the United States mines. Their annual output is about 500,000,000 tons. At that rate it would take only 145 years to exhaust the estimated Canadian supply of good coal, and about 350 years to get to the end of the total supply. And with the increasing population, made up of about four hundred thousand persons a year (and it looks now as if this number would be reached this year), one hundred and seventy-five thousand being an estimate of the immigration from the United States for 1912, the consumption of coal will naturally increase.

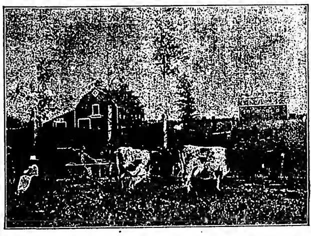
The agricultural districts of Canada have now become so well known throughout the world, and the vacant area of splendid land is still so great that it may be expected that the numbers mentioned will increase from year to year, and it will not be many years before the immigration figures will reach the million mark.

It may be asked what is there to warrant this large immigration? With millions of acres of land, capable of producing twenty-five to forty bushels of wheat to the acre; or, if in oats, from forty to ninety, and even as high as a hundred bushels per acre, or the same splendid yields of flax or barley, there is ample inducement to attract these hundreds of thousands who are filling the present agricultural settlements and pushing forward into the newer settlements year by year, and leave room still for the hundreds of thousands who will follow. There remains not only the agricultural wealth of the country, but there are also the social advantages, the home-making privileges, apart altogether from the financial opportunities, there is the life and the energy born from the knowledge that the settler is more than a unit in the upbuilding, in the making of a country that will soon rank amongst the first in the nations of the world. There is no desire on the part of the writer to dwell upon the success that has followed the American settler in the Provinces of Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta and the coast Province of British Columbia, or to speak of the thousands of individuals whose hundreds of dollars have made them thousands, but attention must be paid to the fact that these people have done well. They are followed by their families and their friends, who also are doing well.

Where, a few years ago, seemingly only months ago, there was nothing but the open prairie, or if we speak of the more central portions of these provinces, the park districts, there are today well tilled and cultivated farms, large farms, too, and the herds of cattle. Cities and towns are the result of the opening up of this rich field of agriculture, and it is a high class of agriculture, carried on by the use of brains, and, where energy has not been endowed, it has become in that splendid air a case of inoculated energy.

The rapid advancement of railways makes the situation easy. Today one may be located thirty miles from one of the many branches of the different systems. A year from now, the whistle of the locomotive and the long train of cars may pass the farm, the elevator is but a short drive from the home, a splendid market is established, and all the advantages of an old settled community are at hand.

The prospects this year from an agricultural standpoint are exceedingly bright, and, relieved of untoward conditions, the farmer is already counting his bank roll, planning for more extensive operations for next year, and figuring on paying out for his farm. He is calculating what the increased value of his holdings, as a result of a successful crop, will add to his assets. Already some fields of wheat have been harvested, barley has been cut, and the yield is above his expectation. In fact, the feeling at the time of writing is that never in the history of any country on the continent has there been such a prospect of a large average crop, all over the three central provinces of Canada, as will be harvested this year. The railroads are adding to their already large mileage and have got ready for handling the crop thousands of box cars. The government agents and the railways are making arrangements for from fifty to sixty thousand extra farm hands in order that the crop may be successfully and quickly harvested, business men are laying in larger stocks than usual, real estate men are active, preparing for the rush of business that is sure to follow, and everywhere there is the note of optimism, which seems to be perfectly justifiable.



The Dairy Helps the Farmer in Western Canada.

There is, as has been said, a vast area of the country still open for settlement and homesteading lying in the center north. Speaking of this part a writer, who made the trip when the crop was in its green stage, said:

"Just now, the whole country is a beautiful sight, as it presents itself in full dress of living green, varied in shade, many places elegantly fringed and interspersed with plantings of shrubbery and patches of sweet scented flowers in rose, yellow, white, pink, scarlet, cardinal and purple. In traveling over the virgin soil, I have seen some of the most charming rolling prairies, sloping hills, deep ravines, mirrored lakes, artistic flower fields, and natural parks that one could wish to behold, and all placed there without the aid of man. The land in general is heavily matted with grass, mixed with vetches and pea vines, nearly up to the knee, and many millions of acres of which are going to waste while beef, pork and mutton are soaring at prices heretofore unknown. The comparatively small acreage under cultivation reminds one of a few small garden patches.

"When we consider the estimated crop of 300,000,000 bushels of wheat for 1912, to be produced on these western prairies from these garden patches, some faint idea can be formed by an imaginative mind as to the immense possibilities and rich heritage of a glorious western Canada."

The estimate of the wheat crop, as made by the writer quoted, is excessive, but with even 250 million bushels, there will be a great deal of satisfaction on the part of the settlers.

Uniforms and Diplomacy.

The gazettes have announced that the emperor of Germany has deigned to name Mon. de Kiderlen-Waechter major of the Seventy-first Thuringian infantry. To please his august master, the minister sometimes wears his uniform, but in it he gives no illusion of elegance. The other day, to console himself, he said: "I believe my colleague, M. Poincare (the French ambassador) would appear more ridiculous than I do if he were obliged to dress as an artillerist."

Prince von Buelow, who is colonel of hussars, rode in the grand review at the head of his regiment. Some years ago at [illegible] the emperor remark[illegible] some squadrons that were moving in zigzags across the field in a manner scarcely correct. They were the hussars of M. von Buelow. "Ach!" cried Wilhelm II., "mit Buelow immer die krumme wege der diplomatie!" (Oh, with Buelow, it is always the crooked ways of diplomacy.)—Le Cri de Paris.

ROOSEVELT GIVES PLAN OF BATTLE

Address of the Colonel Before the Progressive Convention.

PRINCIPLES OF NEW PARTY

Leader Discusses Courts and the People, Control of Trusts, Cost of Living, Tariff and Other Great Issues.

Chicago, Aug. 6.—Theodore Roosevelt today addressed the convention of the National Progressive party, sounding the keynote for his followers and laying down the plan of battle to be waged by the new party. He discussed the principles of that party under these twelve subdivisions: The Helplessness of the Old Parties; The Right of the People to Rule; The Courts and the People; Constructive Control of the Trusts; Rights of the Wage-Worker; The Farmer; The Tariff; The High Cost of Living; Currency; Conservation; Alaska and International Affairs.

"The two old parties," he said, "are husks, with no real soul within either, divided on artificial lines, boss-ridden and privilege controlled, each a jumble of incongruous elements, and neither daring to speak out wisely and fearlessly what should be said on the vital issues of the day." As opposed to this incongruity and insincerity of action he asserted that the National Progressive platform will be "a contract with the people," with definite and concrete provision to be carried out if the people ratify the contract on election day as exactly and honestly "as if it were actually enforceable under the law."

Old Parties Inadequate.

Following is a summary of the colonel's speech:

Neither the Republican nor the Democratic platforms or managers show any adequate recognition of the mighty fact "that we are now in the midst of a great economic evolution." This irresistible movement for economic change and improvement must be guided by "both common sense and the highest ethical standards," in order to prevent reasonable evolution from becoming dangerous revolution. The Democratic party, as is indicated by its present record in congress, lacks the common sense, and the Republican party, by its record of stolen delegates at the Chicago convention, lacks the ethical standards.

If this country is really to go forward along a path of social and economic justice, there must be a new party of nation-wide and non-sectional principles, a party where the titular national chiefs and the real state leaders shall be in genuine accord, a party in whose counsels the people shall be supreme, a party that shall represent in the nation and the several states alike the same cause, the cause of human rights and of governmental efficiency. The reassertion of the states' rights doctrine of the Democratic party cripples and forecloses any real or genuine relief to the people. It reduces their promises to hopeless and empty phrases. The mission and spirit of the Progressive movement will thrill the Republic from end to end.

Right of the People to Rule.

"The actions of the Chicago convention, and to an only less degree of the Baltimore convention, have shown in striking fashion how little the people do rule under our present conditions." In order to assure this popular rule Mr. Roosevelt urged the adoption of presidential primaries, popular election of senators, the short ballot, efficient corrupt practices act, qualified use of the initiative, referendum, and recall. The recall should be applied to administrative officers. Mr. Roosevelt asserted that the adoption of these new methods of political administration is not antagonistic to representative government. "All I desire to do by securing more direct control of the governmental agents and representatives of the people is to give the people the chance to make their representatives really represent them whenever the government becomes misrepresentative instead of representative. I have not come to this way of thinking from closet study or as a mere matter of theory. I have been forced to it by a long experience with the actual conditions of our political life."

The Courts and the People.

Under this head Mr. Roosevelt strongly emphasized the necessity of the sovereign people preserving a check on every branch of public service. He reiterates his now well-known views regarding the courts. "The American people, and not the courts, are to determine their own fundamental policies." This does not mean that the people are to interfere in cases which involve merely questions of justice between individuals except that "means should be devised for making it easier than at present to get rid of an incompetent judge." But when a judicial decision involves an interpretation of what the people mean by the constitutions which they have framed and laws passed by the people are nullified because the courts say those laws are contrary to the people's will as expressed in their constitution, there must be a "reference to the people of the public effect of such decisions under forms securing full deliberation," to the end that the people [illegible] all the force of a constitutional amendment. "Our purpose is not to impugn the courts, but to emancipate them from a position whenever they stand finally in the way of social justice. The propositions I make constitute neither anarchy nor Socialism, but, on the contrary, a corrective for Socialism and an antidote to anarchy."

Constructive Control of Trusts.

In addition to punishment for wrongdoing by the trusts, the imperative demand is effective and complete regulation. "The present conditions of business cannot be accepted as satisfactory." The reason for this is explained, in Mr. Roosevelt's opinion, by the fact that those dealing with the subject have attempted to divide into two camps, each as unwise as the other." The tendency of those now in control of the Republican party is to give special privileges to "big business," and to correct the evil of such a course when they become crying, by sporadic lawsuits under the anti-trust law. The tendency of the Democrats, judged both by their record in congress and by the Democratic platform, is to abolish all business of any size or efficiency, on the ground that all bigness is badness, and littleness and weakness a sign of virtue. "What is needed is action directly the reverse of that thus confusedly indicated."

There should be applied to all industrial concerns engaged in interstate commerce in which there is either monopoly or control of the market the principles already adopted "in regulating transportation concerns engaged in such commerce. The anti-trust law should be kept on the statute book to be invoked against every big concern tending to monopoly or guilty of anti-social practices. At the same time a national industrial commission should be created which should have complete power to regulate and control all the great industrial concerns engaged in interstate business—which practically means all of them in this country. This commission should exercise over these industrial concerns like powers to those exercised over the railways by the interstate commerce commission and over the national banks by the comptroller of the currency, and additional powers if found necessary."

When corporations not submitting themselves to the regulation of the commission or clearly evading or violating its orders are prosecuted under the anti-trust law and convicted, the commission should have the duty of seeing "that the decree of the court is put into effect completely." Only in this way can there be avoided "such gross scandals as those attendant upon the present administration's prosecution of the Standard Oil and the tobacco trusts," a prosecution which has merely resulted in increased prices to the public, injury to the small competitor, and actual financial benefit to the trusts themselves."

Justice to Wage-Workers.

Mr. Roosevelt presented an advanced and comprehensive plan to insure the rights and better conditions for labor. He proposed several specific methods for preserving and improving "our human resources, and therefore our labor power." Wage scales and other labor data should be made public; all deaths, injuries, and diseases due to industrial operation should be reported to the authorities; wage commissions should be established in the nation and state to determine the minimum wage scale in different industries; the federal government should investigate all industries with a view to establishing standards of sanitation and safety; there should be mine and factory inspection according to standards fixed by inter-state agreement or by the federal government; national and state legislation should establish standards of compensation for industrial accidents and deaths and for diseases clearly due to industrial conditions; for the adoption by law of a fair standard of compensation for casualties resulting fatally which shall clearly fix the minimum compensation in all cases; the monetary equivalent of a living wage varies according to local conditions, but should be sufficiently high to make morality possible and to provide for education, recreation, proper care of the children, maintenance during sickness, and reasonable saving for old age; excessive hours of labor should be prohibited for all wage-workers, and night labor of woman and children should be forbidden; one day of rest in seven should be provided by law; continuous twenty-four-hour labor should be divided into three shifts of eight hours by law; tenement-house manufacture should be entirely prohibited, and labor camps should be subject to governmental sanitary regulation; all industries employing women and children should be specially subject to government inspection and regulation; insurance funds against sickness, accident, invalidism, and old age should be established by a charge either in whole or in part upon the industries; the suffrage should be granted to women, if for no other reason, to enable workingwomen to combine for their own protection by the use of the ballot.

The Farmer.

"The country life commission should be revived with greatly increased power; its abandonment was a severe blow to our people. The welfare of the farmer is a basic need of this nation." The country school should be brought in touch with country life. For this reason the Progressives approve of government co-operation with the farmer to make the farm more productive. Co-operative [illegible] as the farmer leaves co-operative activities with their profit-sharing to the city man of business, so long will the foundations of wealth be undermined and the comforts of enlightenment be impossible in the country communities."

The Tariff.

On the tariff he said: "I believe in a protective tariff, but I believe in it as a principle approached from a standpoint of the interests of the whole people, and not as a bundle of preferences to be given favorite individuals. It is not merely the tariff that should be revised, but the method of tariff-making and of tariff administration." "The first steps should be the creation of a permanent commission of non-partisan experts" of "ample powers" to secure "exact and reliable information." This commission must scientifically determine "the difference in the cost of production here and abroad," the effect on "prices to the consumer," insure full justice to the pay envelope of the wage-earner. The commission must not attempt to encroach on the tariff-making power of congress. It shall report with full publicity and promptly. The tariff shall be revised schedule by schedule to avoid the "staggering blows to business" incident to former general revisions. The effect will be to wipe out the "log-rolling and vote-trading" secured by special interests in the past.

High Cost of Living.

"The cost of living," said Mr. Roosevelt, "has risen during the last few years out of all proportion to the increase of most salaries and wages." What is first necessary is "fearless, intelligent, and searching inquiry into the whole subject, made absolutely by a non-partisan body of experts with no prejudice to warp their mind, no private object to serve, who shall recommend any necessary remedy heedless of what interest may be hurt thereby, and caring only for the interests of the people as a whole." The Republicans promise such an inquiry, but their rank dishonesty of action at the Chicago convention "makes their every promise worthless." It is hopeless to turn to the Democratic party for relief, because first the Democratic party "affects to find the entire high cost of living in the tariff," ignoring the patent fact that the problem is world-wide, equally pressing in free-trade England and in highly protected Germany. Moreover, if the Democrats are sincere they must take all duties off the products of the farmer, and we "certainly cannot afford to have the farmer struck down." Various elements, economic, political, and social, were pointed out by Mr. Roosevelt as contributing to the high cost of living. But effective legislation regarding it can only be framed on a comprehensive scale after a thorough, scientific, and prompt inquiry.

The Currency.

Mr. Roosevelt declared that our present bank currency based on government bonds is unscientific and urged the adoption of a system which shall provide "elasticity in the credit and currency necessary for the conduct of business, free from recurring panics." The control of such a system should be in the hands of the government, and must be free from "manipulation by Wall street or the large interests."

Conservation.

Under this head Mr. Roosevelt reaffirmed his well-known policy on the conservation and reclamation of national resources. We must conserve our soil, our forests, our mines, not only for our own benefit but for the benefit of our children and descendants. "The public should not alienate its fee in the water-power which will be of incalculable value as a source of power in the immediate future," and "we should undertake the complete development and control of the Mississippi as a national work, just as we have undertaken the work of building the Panama canal."

Alaska.

"In Alaska the government has an opportunity of starting in what is almost a fresh field to work out various problems by actual experiment." It should at once construct, own, and operate all the railways in Alaska; it should keep the fee of all coal-fields and allow them to be operated by lessee with the condition in the lease that non-use shall operate as a forfeit; a system of land taxation should be tried which promotes the actual use of land and discourages the holding of land for speculation; the telegraph lines should be owned and operated by the government."

International Affairs.

"In international affairs this country should behave towards other nations exactly as an honorable private citizen behaves towards other private citizens." Our small army should have large efficiency; the navy must be steadily built up until "it proves possible to secure by international agreement a general reduction of armaments;" the Panama canal must be fortified. Panama canal tolls on deep-water commerce should be uniform to all nations, including ourselves; American coastwise vessels should pass through the canal free, for this would be no discrimination against foreign nations and would give us reasonable competition with transcontinental railways. No foreign treaty should be entered into which we do not mean to scrupulously observe in every particular.

In conclusion the colonel said:

"Surely there never was a fight better worth making than the one in which we are engaged. It little matters what befalls any one of us who for the time being stand in the forefront of the battle. I hope we shall win, and I believe that [illegible]

SAVING TREES BY GRAFTING

Injured Parts Are Bridged by Means of Scions of Last Year's Growth. —Plan Outlined.

Orchard trees which have been girdled may often be saved by what is called bridge grafting. This consists in bridging the injured parts by means of scions of the last season's growth, thus connecting the part below the wound with that above. First trim the bark around the injured parts. Then sharpen the ends of the scions to a wedge shape and fit tightly into the layer of new wood just beneath the bark, called the cambium layer. Cover the union at the end of the scions with grafting wax, completely to exclude the air. Also, wrap the wound with cloth to protect it from drying out, likewise cover the wax with old muslin to keep it from being melted by the sun. If the lower edge of the wound is near enough to the ground to make it practicable to do so, it is better to cover it three or four inches deep with fresh earth.

Where the trees are very young and the girdling is severe, cutting the trunk off below the wound is probably the best treatment. The exposed part of the stub should at once be coated with grafting wax. Select the best sprout that starts and support it by tying it to a firm stake until it is stocky enough to withstand strong winds without danger of being broken off. When the sprout is well started dress the stump so that it may heal over readily. Cut the stub slanting at the base of the sprout so that it will shed water. Then cover the wound with paint made of pure white lead and raw linseed oil, to protect it from water and from disease germs. Do not spread the paint beyond the cut surface. This method should produce a tree of bearing age sooner than one could be grown from a replanted nursery tree.

To make grafting wax, melt together four parts, by weight, of resin, two parts of beeswax, and one part of beef tallow or raw linseed oil. Apply while moderately hot with a brush or dauber. A supply of the wax may be kept on hand by taking the mixture when hot and pouring it into water. When it is sufficiently cool, work with the hands until the mass assumes a buff color. Make into balls and wrap with waxed paper to prevent the balls from sticking together.

HOW TO PLANT STRAWBERRY

Best to Have Plants in Bucket Containing Water to Keep Roots in a Moist Condition.

One of the best methods of planting strawberries is to thrust a spade straight into the ground at the proper place to a depth of five or six inches, writes R. S. Sando in Outing, and then lean it over to one side, forcing the soil out of the way and leaving a wedge shaped hole, one wall of which is straight up and down. The roots of the plant should be spread out in a fan shape against this wall and the spade, then set in the ground about six inches farther forward, and by a backward movement of the handle firmly press the dirt against the roots of the plant. To lend additional firmness to the soil, step with one foot on either side of the plant.

The last hole made by the spade should have some soil raked into it before leaving. When setting the plants it is best to have them in a bucket containing a little water in order that the roots may be kept moist until they are planted; but it is not necessary or advisable to water plants immediately after setting them.

HORTICULTURAL NOTES

Keep the weeds out of the orchard.

Fire blight attacks the pear, quince and apple.

Thinning fruit usually pays, grading fruit always does.

Put on an old mitten and get after the tent caterpillars.

Raspberries should be picked when they have turned red.

There is not a home that can afford to be without blackberries.

In growing dewberries on a large scale one of the serious problems is that of securing pickers.

As a crop for the young orchard beans come as near being the ideal as anything that can be grown.

To watch the trees and vines grow that one has planted, to provide bowers as well as fruit, is a pleasing ambition.

Get the blackberries out of the sun as soon as they are picked, or they are likely to turn red in spots and be less palable.

Leave plenty of mulch between the strawberry rows when uncovering. It helps to retain moisture, and keeps berries cleaner. [illegible]

WHY COWS STOOD IN WATER

Artistic Limitations Responsible for Characteristic Attitude of the Humble Bovine.

In a north of England town there was a shiftless man who would never accept gifts outright, although he was always depending on charity, says Al Priddy, in his book, "Through the Mill," relates the Youth's Companion. He painted landscapes, and my aunt, when benevolently inclined, would hire him to decorate our walls with rural scenes, highly colored in glaring tints, as if nature had turned color blind. There were cows in every scene, and Aunt Millie noticed that all the cows were up to their knees in water. Not one stood on the vivid green hills.

"Jorvay," she remarked to the old man, "why do you always put the cows in the water?"

"It's this way, Mrs. Brindin," the old artist responded. "You see, ma'am, I never learned to paint hoofs."

Awful.

A West End woman called the attention of her husband to a little baby which was trying to sleep on the porch of its home on the opposite side of the street.

"It's lying on the bare boards, isn't it?" he observed.

"Yes, they haven't even placed a rug for the little chap to rest his head on."

The husband took another look.

"And what do you think of that?" he ejaculated. "They haven't even painted the boards."—Youngstown (O.) Telegram.

"Exclamatory" Was Right.

Mrs. Mason's colored washerwoman, Martha, was complaining of her husband's health.

"Why, is he sick, Martha?" asked Mrs. Mason.

"He's ve'y po'ly, Ma'am, po'ly," answered the woman. "He's got the exclamatory rheumatism."

"You mean inflammatory, Martha," said the patron. "Exclamatory means to cry out."

"Yas, ma'am," replied Martha, with conviction, "dat's what it is. He hollers all the time."—Judge.

Her Engagements.

Miss Vivian is very much of a flirt and she has been engaged to a dozen young men during the few seasons she has been on the eligible list. A few days ago she said to her father:

"Pa, you may congratulate me on having acquired a new object of my affection."

"I am glad to hear it," he replied. "I hope you are as happy with him as you will be with the next one."

Congratulated.

FAMILY RUNT

Kansas Man Says Coffee Made Him That.

"Coffee has been used in our family of eleven—father, mother, five sons and four daughters—for thirty years. I am the eldest of the boys and have always been considered the runt of the family and a coffee toper.

"I continued to drink it for years until I grew to be a man, and then I found I had stomach trouble, nervous headaches, poor circulation, was unable to do a full day's work, took medicine for this, that and the other thing, without the least benefit. In fact I only weighed 116 when I was 28.

"Then I changed from coffee to Postum, being the first one in our family to do so. I noticed, as did the rest of the family, that I was surely gaining strength and flesh. Shortly after I was visiting my cousin who said, 'You look so much better—you're getting fat.'

"At breakfast his wife passed me a cup of coffee, as she knew I was always such a coffee drinker, but I said, 'No, thank you.'

"'What!' said my cousin, 'you quit coffee? What do you drink?'

"'Postum,' I said, 'or water, and I am well.' They did not know what Postum was, but my cousin had stomach trouble and could not sleep at night from drinking coffee three times a day. He was glad to learn about Postum, but said he never knew coffee would hurt anyone." (Tea is just as injurious as coffee because it contains caffeine, the same drug found in coffee.)

"After understanding my condition and how I got well he knew what to do for himself. He discovered that coffee was the cause of his trouble as he never used tobacco or anything else of the kind. You should see the change in him now. We both believe that if persons who suffer from coffee drinking would stop and use Postum they could build back to health and happiness." Name given by Postum Co., Battle Creek, Mich.

PIZARRO'S QUEST OF EL DORADO

TOWARD the end of February, 1541, Gonzalo Pizarro started in search of El Dorado at the head of what was then considered a large and well-equipped force of men. He had under his command 500 Spaniards, 100 of whom were mounted, and 4,000 Indians.

The enterprise was begun with careful preparation and with high hopes, but was doomed, so far as its immediate object was concerned, to have a disastrous termination, for scarcely had those taking part in it reached the fastnesses of the Andes, but a few miles distant from Quito, when their difficulties began. The intense cold and the piercing winds which they encountered in crossing the formidable barrier of the eastern Cordillera caused untold suffering and occasioned the death of many of the Indians. Then, to add to their hardships, they experienced one of those frightful earthquakes which are so frequent in this land of terrific volcanoes. This was succeeded by a torrential downpour, by thunder and lightning, which seemed to portend all the dire calamities that thereafter ensued. This deluge continued unabated for weeks and so saturated the soil that progress became almost impossible. The adventurers were surrounded by swollen streams, dangerous morasses, and by forests and thickets so dense that they had to hew a way through them by axes and machetes. Drenched with incessant rains that spoiled their food and equipment, rotted their garments, and, as the chronicler Molina expresses it, "baptized their very souls," they were soon confronted with starvation. Their live stock, including even their horses and dogs, had been consumed, and they were reduced to subsisting on such edible fruits and herbs as they could find in the forest.

A CONFLICT BETWEEN THE SPANIARDS AND INDIANS

AMAZONS PRACTICING ARCHERY ON THEIR PRISONERS

But pressed as they were by hunger and spent by toil so that they could scarcely move, these determined men of blood and iron still persisted in their course. They found the land of cinnamon, but as they had set out in quest of El Dorado they were loath, notwithstanding the countless difficulties which beset their path, to desist from their undertaking. In order to make better headway, Pizarro resolved to construct a brigantine. Under the circumstances this was a herculean task, for he had neither the materials nor the necessary workmen. This vessel, which was constructed under such adverse conditions, was remarkable not only as being the first floated on these inland waters by Europeans, but also as the one that was soon afterwards utilized in making one of the most notable voyages recorded in the annals of discovery. For it was the San Pedro—this was the name of the brigantine—that enabled Orellana, Pizarro's lieutenant, to discover the mighty Amazon, and that with the Victoria, which was built after the San Pedro, carried the leader and his intrepid companions in safety to the island of Cubagua, north of the coast of Venezuela.

For courage and constancy in the midst of untold hardships and dangers the expedition of Gonzalo Pizarro was truly remarkable. The intrepid adventurers composing it had to contend at every step with a gigantic and invincible enemy—rude and savage nature with all its powerful elements of destruction.

During this expedition the Spaniards, says Gomara, "traveled 400 leagues, the entire distance through a pathless wilderness." Of the 300 and more that started on it less than a hundred returned to Quito, and among them was not a single one of the 4,000 Indians who had accompanied them on their departure.

And what was the net result of this expedition? Outside of the discovery of the Amazon by Orellana, which was incidental, it was virtually nil. The adventurers found, it is true, the land of cinnamon, but the trees bearing the precious bark were so few and widely separated, and so far away from means of transportation, that they were practically valueless. Beyond certain vague rumors of a rich and powerful chief living somewhere between the Amazon and the Rio Negro they could secure no information regarding the gilded king and the province of gold that were the objects of their quest. And what seems passing strange is that Padre Carbajal, the chronicler of Orellana's expedition, makes no mention whatever of El Dorado, although he must have known that it was this mysterious character that Gonzalo Pizarro had chiefly in view when he left Quito for the land of Canela. Aside, then, from their value to geographical science the expeditions of both Pizarro and Orellanas were as barren of the results sought as was that of Belalcazar a few years before.

But failure on the part of these three gallant leaders and the recital of the terrible sufferings and hardships which had been endured by those who had taken part in the first enterprises, did not discourage others or deter them from essaying to achieve success where their luckless predecessors had failed. The vague and conflicting reports about the rich and powerful tribe of Indians east of the Andes and north of the Amazon called the Omaguas, were sufficient to determine the organization and equipment of new expeditions without delay, the aim of all of which was to discover the ever-alluring and elusive El Dorado.

Even before Orellana had embarked for Spain to seek the governorship of the region he had discovered, another expedition in search of the "gilded man" was nearing its termination. This was under the command of Fernan Perez de Quesada, who, like so many others, had been captivated by the glowing accounts of El Dorado's riches given him by the soldiers of Belalcazar and resolved forthwith to abandon the comforts and luxuries, which, as governor of New Granada, he enjoyed during the absence in Spain of his brother Gonzalo, and go in pursuit of a flitting phantom. This enterprise, consisting of more than 250 men, having 200 horses, was begun at Tunja, north of Bogota, in September, 1545. The adventurers, after crossing the eastern Cordillera and reaching what are now known as the llanos of Colombia, advanced toward the south, with the Sierras on their right and the broad grassy plains of the lowlands on the left. Their hardships and sufferings in the wilderness from lack of food were appalling enough, but they were still more intensified by the incessant rains and by the frequent attacks of savage Indians. But, notwithstanding all these difficulties, they eventually succeeded in reaching the headwaters of the Caqueta and in penetrating even the land of Canela, which had but a short time previously witnessed the homeward march of Gonzalo Pizarro and his helpless band. Quesada's expedition, like Pizarro's, lasted 16 months, during which he lost 80 men and all his horses. And like his ill-starred predecessor, he had nothing to show for his enormous expenditure of energy and courage but a depleted purse. And withal, El Dorado was still as far away from the eager, expectant Spaniards as ever.

While Quesada was cutting his way through the impenetrable jungles of the montana, another expedition was organizing at Coro in northwestern Venezuela under Philip von Hutten, a relative of the Welsers, the rich German bankers of Augsburg, who then held from the Emperor Charles V. a large concession of land in Tierra Firme and who were bent on securing a part of the vast treasures reported to be in the territory ceded them by the Spanish monarch.

Von Hutten had 150 men under his command when he left Coro in June, 1541. He went by sea to Burburata, thence to Valencia and [illegible], whence he started for the llanos, following closely in the footsteps of Federmann until he reached a pueblo called by this gallant commander La Fragua and by Hohermuth Nuestra Senora, but which was subsequently known as San Juan de los Llanos. Arrived at this place, he learned from the Indians that Fernan Perez de Quesada had but a few days previously passed through it with a large force of foot and horse.

Von Hutten, after serious deliberation, concluded to follow closely in the rear of Quesada in the hope of sharing with him the treasures of El Dorado, should he succeed in discovering his whereabouts. The march of both expeditions was through trackless plains and woods, across impetuous rivers and deep morasses, in tropic heat and torrential rains that were more than enough to depress the stoutest hearts. But these dauntless soldiers of fortune pressed onward, fully convinced that they would eventually find the object of their quest. After untold trials and dangers Quesada at length reached the Province of Papamene, at the headwaters of the Caqueta or Japura, and thence made his way to Popayan, whence he was glad to return to Bogota a wiser but a poorer man.

Von Hutten after following him to Timana, near the crest of the eastern Cordillera, to the southeast of Popayan, faced about and directed his course toward the river Guaviare, on the banks of which his Indian guide had assured him was a great city called Macatoa, the capital of a region rich in gold and silver. As an evidence of the truth of his story he showed the German leader samples of gold fashioned in the form of apples or nisperos, which, he said, had been brought from that city. But before he could reach his eagerly coveted goal the winter season came on, and the entire country was inundated. There was then nothing left for them to do but seek higher ground and await the return of the dry season. But as the district in which they took refuge was sparsely populated and almost entirely destitute of the means of subsistence the intrepid explorers soon began to experience all the horrors of a famine. For a while their chief sustenance was a mixture of maize and ants. The ants were secured by placing some maize near the opening of an ant hill, and when it was covered with these insects they consumed maize and insects together and thus appeased their hunger. But as there was not enough of this aliment for all, many were fain to appease the gnawings of hunger by consuming grubs, beetles, or other things equally disgusting. In consequence of this their hair, beards and eyebrows fell off. "Finally," writes Oviedo y Banos, "all were covered with pestiferous tumors and poisonous ulcers, and that afflicted troop was converted into a theater of miseries and an hospital of misfortunes." When the inundation had subsided sufficiently to permit them to travel they resumed their march, and after long wandering about in the wilderness they found themselves again at Nuestra Senora, whence they had departed a twelvemonth before.

Their failure and hardships did not, however, cause them to abandon their enterprise. Far from it. Their ardor was as quenchless and their determination to achieve success was as strong as when they took their departure from Coro. The reported existence toward the south of a country abounding in gold and silver supplied them with a new clue and gave zest to the expedition. After a long and perilous march, during which they passed through the country of the Uapes and visited their capital, Macatoa, the brave and persevering expeditioners reached the land of the rich and powerful Omaguas, who inhabited the territory between the Guaviare and the Caqueta, that land which Wallace, as late as 1853, called "the unknown regions between the Rio Guaviara on one side and the Japura on the other."

Here, from an elevated position, the adventurers descried what they fondly believed was the goal which they had so long been striving to reach. It was a city so large that though it was near at hand it extended beyond the range of vision. The streets were straight with the houses close together, and in the midst of all was an imposing edifice, which their Indian guide informed them was the palace of Quarica, the lord of the Omaguas. The structure also served as a temple in which, Von Hutten's guide stated, were idols of massive gold. Some of them, he averred, were as children 3 and 4 years old, while one of them was of the size of a full-grown woman. Besides these objects there were also there incalculable treasures belonging to the cacique and his vassals. And beyond this great city, the Spaniards were assured, were other larger and richer cities belonging to powerful chieftains, who governed countless subjects and whose treasures of gold were far greater than those of the lord of the imposing city on which their eyes were then riveted.

With such vast riches within their grasp the adventurers were beside themselves with joy. And although they counted but 40 men all told, they did not hesitate to attack a city in which, as they had been apprised, was a large and well-trained army. Putting spurs to his horse, Van Hutten dashed forward, followed by his men, who all confidently expected to be in a few hours the possessors of princely fortunes. But a well-directed javelin from the hand of an Omaguan Indian, which seriously wounded the daring leader, suddenly arrested the impetuous onset and compelled the attacking party to beat a hasty retreat. But 15,000 Omaguan warriors were soon in hot pursuit and shortly after engaged the invaders in battle. The Indians, however, notwithstanding their vastly superior numbers, were defeated with great loss, while the followers of Von Hutten, under the command of Pedro de Limpias, did not have a single casualty. The victors then returned to Nuestra Senora, where six months before they had left their infirm and incapacitated companions. A council of war was then convened, in which it was decided not to prosecute the enterprise so auspiciously begun without more men. These had to be obtained from Coro. But Von Hutten did not live to realize his fond hopes, for he was soon afterwords cruelly murdered through the treachery of Pedro de Limpias, when those who had taken part in the expedition disbanded without making any further attempt to gain possession of the rich kingdom which they had discovered and which they had already considered as theirs by right of virtual conquest.

Did Von Hutten really discover El Dorado? He certainly thought so, as did likewise his brave followers. Fully crediting what his Indian guides had told him regarding the vast treasures of gold kept in the temple of the Omaguas, he concluded at once that the cacique of this tribe was no other than the long-sought-for "Gilded King," although he had no ocular evidence of the fact or any tangible proof of the existence of the great stores of gold and silver of which he had heard such glowing reports. As to the city of the Omaguas, which, we are told, was so large that it extended beyond the range of vision, it was manifestly the creation of an excited fancy and as much of an exaggeration as the battle of 39 Europeans against 15,000 Indians.

It could, at best, have been nothing more than an agglomeration of villages, and the palace and temple, far from being the imposing edifice described, was but a large thatched structure similar to those still seen in the region bordering the Equator.

Be this, however, as it may, the fact remains that Von Hutten's expedition created an extraordinary sensation both in the New and in the Old World. Other adventurers had but heard of El Dorado, but the German commander and his men had actually located him and had gazed on his palace, which was an immense storehouse of silver and gold. Naturally they were elated, for they had succeeded in achieving what others had failed to accomplish. The Gilded Man was no longer a mere chimera but a being with a "local habitation and a name." He was the ruler of a densely populated region between the Guaviare and the Amazon and his people were known as Omaguas. Thenceforward the name El Dorado was coupled with that of the Omaguas and both names were regarded as synonymous with inexhaustible wealth.

Mistaken Kindness.

"Bliggins is always getting into trouble through his charitable disposition."

"What is his latest adventure?"

"He insisted on stopping one of these young men who run through the streets in marathon costume. He wanted to sympathize with him and give him a regular suit of clothes."

Merely a Deduction.

"So you are going to Europe this summer, Mrs. Gottalotte?"

"Yes; my daughter and I are planning to start in a few weeks. But how did you know about it? We haven't told anybody."

"Oh, I noticed that you were not having any clothes made over here."

FINDS ANCIENT RACE

Archaeological Remains of Importance Found in Peru.

Region Near Lake Titicaca Excavated and Tombs Are Discovered—Body of Princess Buried 8,000 Years B. C., Is Recovered.

San Francisco.—Archaeological remains of vast importance to the critical historian and anthropologist and which contribute valuable new evidence, if not an entirely new theory, upon the origin and history of races, are being unearthed in Peru by treasure hunters and scientists, according to Charles R. Kehler, an American mining engineer, who arrived in San Francisco a few days ago from the land of the Incas. Mr. Kehler has just completed a mining survey of the region south of Lake Titicaca, and while prospecting near Arequipa, his Indian workmen discovered a number of small tumuli, which proved to be the tombs of people of an ancient race.

The bodies had been embalmed in the same manner as the Egyptian mummies, and the tombs contained many statues and idols of immense interest in historic anthropology. One tomb contained the mummified remains of a princess in an excellent state of preservation. The body was found in a sitting posture, with the feet drawn up under the thigh and the hands folded across the breast. The body was wrapped in a long cloth of the finest linen, in which had been woven pictoral and hieroglyphical designs. The body was adorned with a heavy gold breast plate, necklace, wristlets and anklets, and carried under each arm a golden vase. One of these vases was the deceased's cocoa bowl, in which a quantity of the prepared cocoa leaves and lime still remained.

Professor Hiram Bingham, who is at the head of an exploring expedition from Yale university, has made several similar discoveries, but what is considered more important than the treasure recovered is the finding of a number of idols and images which throws hitherto unknown light upon the customs and phyological peculiarities of the people.

The tombs discovered near Arequipa, according to the archeologists, were closed at least 8,000 years B. C. They belong to a pre-Inca race, either the Chiepes, Souaseres or the Huallas. Among the interesting images brought north by Mr. Kehler, one is of a god which bears a striking resemblance to the early Coptic reliefs found at Knossus, in Egypt. This statue is about two inches in length and is made of equal parts of gold, silver and copper, and is of exquisite workmanship.

Idol Found Near Arequipa.

Another image recovered to which attaches especial interest is the figure of a man-god, the physical characteristics of which coincide with those of the mummied bodies. It also bears a marked resemblance to the Egyptians. The curved nose, running straight from the forehead, eyes and thick lips, are closely like the sculptured heads which have been recovered of Thutmes III., Princess Nofert and of early Egyptian kings in limestone at Karnak.

These images, together with the methods of embalming, the art objects and household and industrial implements, it is believed, give strong grounds for concluding that the civilization of the Egyptians of the historic period and the ancient Peruvians come from the same source, or that the Egyptians got their civilization from the Peruvians.

Love for Children Halts Suicide.

Fayetteville, N. C.—The love for his two little children, left orphans by the death of their mother, caused Spivey Bullard to change his mind in regard to committing suicide as he hung in space over a 65-foot chasm. He called for help, and was rescued when he was ready to drop from exhaustion.

Policeman on Beat First Time, Makes Big Haul.

NEW YORK.—'Twas a proud day, the other night, for Dennis Redding, beginning his career as a full-fledged policeman. No longer was he to be held in contempt by the coppers of the Tremont avenue police station in the Bronx, where Dennis had been filling the humble office of doorman, which is little more than being a janitor.

Dennis moved up, in and out following Police Commissioner Waldo's new order to increase the efficiency of the force without augmenting its numbers. The order promoted all doormen to be patrolmen.

Dennis' ambition aspired to deeds far above wearing out shoe leather, however, and upon his very first night came the grand opportunity to prove his innate ability. Captain Brennan of the precinct assigned him to keep Third avenue between One Hundred and Sixty-ninth street and One Hundred and Sixty-seventh street clear of underworld folk. Dennis assumed the task at 11 o'clock at night.

Ere the unproductive wee sma' hours had entirely sifted through the hour glass a north-bound Third avenue trolley car was brought to a jerky stop near Dennis' stand. The motorman, frightfully frightened, nearly broke his neck in jumping from the car to inform the amazed Dennis that a most mysterious bundle was lying close to the tracks at One Hundred and Sixty-ninth street.

The bundle turned out to be a box three feet square. Suspected infernal machine! Dennis lifted the heavy object to his shoulder with extra caution.

When Dennis arrived at the station he was foot-sore and shoulder sore. He obtained a jimmy and a hammer, as being the most appropriate instruments with which to open a box labeled "Handle with great care."

Finally the lid was pried off and Dennis lifted out some four pounds of excelsior, underneath which there reposed a boulder bearing this inscription in red paint: "Stung!"

Is Kansas City Woodpecker a Slave to Science?

KANSAS CITY, MO.—Out on Campbell street, the neighborhood is treated each morning to what sounds like the roll of a distant drum or the far away clatter of the trip-hammer on a new skyscraper. It is an elusive sound, now appearing to come from some remote distance, then permeating the whole atmosphere as if close at hand.

The noise was something of a mystery at first, but at last the source of it was discovered. The drummer is a woodpecker, one of the red headed variety. His drum is one of those galvanized iron boxes linemen put, for reasons best known to themselves, just beneath the cross pieces of telephone poles.

It is now several weeks since Mr. Red-head began his musical development. Alighting by chance one morning on the tin box, he, probably as a matter of habit, tried his hard beak on the material which formed his resting place. Apparently the result surprised him. As the resonant response to his tapping rang out he stood erect and looked about him in surprise.

Mr. Redhead flew away. But the result of his experiment lingered in his memory. Here was the Sir Isaac Newton of the feathered world. Why should the apple fall to the ground, or rather why should his pecking in that particular spot cause all that noise and no hole? He would return and investigate again. He did.

Every day since that time Mr. Redhead has delved into the mysteries of science, but hasn't delved perceptibly into the stubborn surface of the echoing box. It is observed that he always hammers in exactly the same place.

Chicago Sleuths to Study Ibsen and Etiquette

I'D RATHER BE PRANCIN' ME BEAT IN TH' 23 2— !!!

CHICAGO.—When a beautiful debutante is suddenly awakened from the spell of a dreamy waltz by the R—r—rip of her gown, and she turns in horror to find the neat number 12 patent leather pump of the corner policeman planted on her train, she need not wonder who let him in.

For Chicago policemen are planning to get their names on the invitation lists of society. The activities of a "Raffles" who attends exclusive entertainments and robs his hostesses, as the cause.

Disguised in full dress suits and their wrists shaved to prevent the bristles from showing in the gap between glove tops and the latest model patent reversible cuffs that will bear evidence to the tender ministrations of Hop Wah, president of the Chinese Laundry trust, they propose to attend fashionable functions.

The latest exploit of the Chesterfieldian burglar was to make off with much valuable loot, including $250 from the handbags of women guests, while Mrs. G. H. Grubbs, 1040 Dakin street, Edgewater, was entertaining. When this was reported, word went out from the Town Hall and Summerdale stations that the limit had been reached, and that policemen assigned to duty as sleuths, must provide themselves with dress suits and study books on "Etiquette, and How It Should Be Served," preparatory to their social campaign.

"Don't you just love Ibsen?" a hostess will ask.

"Well, I don't want to 'knock' our friends, lady." Patrolman Cornelius Bourbon McGillicuddy may reply as he toys with his tea cup, "but if the Gibson you mean is the new 'cop' over at Thirty-third, I can't second the motion. No mum."

Farmer Offers Pigs as Starter for a City Zoo

ST. LOUIS, MO.—A domestic department in the zoological garden is urged by George L. Laage, who, in a letter to the Zoological society, offers to present a nucleus in the shape of a pair of blue-blooded hogs. Although officers of the society believe that what the St. Louis collection needs most is wild animals, some favor such a supplement as Mr. Laage proposes, and his communication will have serious consideration.

The Laage letter is as follows:

"I have noticed with a great deal of interest the progress being made toward establishing a zoo in Forest Park.

"Not wishing to intrude at the same time I am anxious to make a suggestion and a donation.

"So many of the city children, grown folks as well, have seen all kinds of wild animals in traveling menageries, but how many of these city folks have seen our ordinary domestic animals in their habitat?

"My reason for this suggestion: About a year ago I had on exhibition in a show window, a prize pig. A mother with her two children stopped to take a look at it. The children exclaimed: 'Oh, mamma, what a funny looking dog that is!' The mother knew no better and could not explain to her children.

"Why not exhibit our own food-producing animals, such as cows, sheep and hogs, to the children who never get to the country, and let them know where their food stuff comes from?

"Domestic animals can be secured without cost. Anyone having pride in them will be glad to donate or loan them to your proposed zoo.

"To start the ball-a-rolling, I will donate a fine male and female Duroc Jersey hog."

J. P. DON'T KNOW AND HAS NO THINK

J. Pierpont Morgan, who knows a few things about finance and art, music and ecclesiastical history, got back from Europe the other day.

He had been away about six months during approximately the period the Stanley committee has been occupied in taking testimony and reporting. He has been up the Nile, in the art and money centers, and has done some yachting on his Corsair, which arrived ahead of its owner.

The yacht, with members of his family and grandchildren aboard, raking the steamer fore and aft with marine glasses, was at quarantine early in the morning. Son Jack Morgan went aboard the ship and found his father at breakfast. Mr. Morgan's niece, Miss Annie Tracey, and her friend, Miss Berwind, who were passengers, were at the same table.

The banker was very affable, if uncommunicative, when seen later. He wore a gray sack suit and a small Panama with the rim turned up all around and bit one of the Morgan dollar cigars and held his cane in the air. He said: "Good morning" to the newspaper squad, but gave no chance for an interview.

"Go away. Get out. Nothing to say. Wouldn't say it here if I had! Wey. Leave me alone," was his answer to the request for a talk.

"Mr. Morgan, will you——"

"No, I won't. You know I won't. Why do you bother me this way?"

The young man suggested to Mr. Morgan that he could get his salary raised if he could extract an interview from him.

"All right. How much will they raise it? I'll pay the difference. Give you a check right now. But tell me how much and then get out."

"Mr. Morgan, you were pretty close to Emperor William?"

He whirled. "Who said so? Who told you that?"

"It was cabled to the newspapers."

"Well," the Wall street power snapped, "what of it? For God's sake, what of it?"

"Winston Churchill made a speech in parliament."

"Did he, did he?" inquired Mr. Morgan, becoming interested, and turning upon the companionway. "What did he say? What did he say?"

"He called for 500,000 pounds and expressed an open fear of Germany."

"Humph!" said the kaiser's guest.

"Do you think that means war?"

"How should I know?" he replied, without turning.

"But you were with Emperor William?"

"He did not tell me he was going to war. He didn't tell me anything about it. See, here," continued Morgan, putting his emphatic fist under the reporter's nose, "I don't know and I don't think. I have got no think. Understand?"

HETTY GREEN TO JOIN CHURCH

Mrs. Hetty Green, who is in her seventy-eighth year, was baptized the other day in the Episcopal faith in order to prepare for confirmation as a member of the church.

The ceremony was performed in Jersey City by the Rev. Augustine Elmendorf, rector of Holy Cross Episcopal church, Arlington and Claremont avenues, in the presence of Col. Edward Howland Robinson Green, on whose shoulders have fallen much of his mother's great business responsibilities.

Father Elmendorf, as the clergyman is called by his parishioners, is distantly related to Mrs. Green, and for five or six years he has been endeavoring to induce her to think less of things earthly. He kept his secret to himself and labored diligently in his role of missionary by writing letters or carrying the message to her office in person.

Father Elmendorf went to the Trinity building, in New York city where Mrs. Green has her office, on the day of the ceremony. Although the great majority of workers in the financial district had taken advantage of the Saturday afternoon holiday, Mrs. Green was still busy, but as soon as she could straighten out everything she said she was ready to go with the minister. Colonel Green had his car in readiness and the trip across the river to Jersey City on their spiritual mission was made.

Several persons noticed Mrs. Green as she alighted from the car and entered the rectory, but nobody recognized her. Even the sexton of the church was kept in ignorance. The baptismal ceremony was conducted in the church. Owing to the advanced age of Mrs. Green sponsors were not required, according to the church laws, and Colonel Green merely acted as a witness. The Greens returned to New York after the ceremony.

Mrs. Green will now prepare herself for confirmation, a ceremony that will be conducted by Bishop Edwin S. Lines of the New York diocese.

THE RAPID RISE OF CHARLES D. HILLES

C. D. Hilles, today field marshal of the Republican forces, was, less than four years ago, guarding the interests of several hundred orphans in a juvenile asylum at Lancaster, Ohio, of which he was the superintendent. His rapid rise in public life is a dramatic story and intensely American in its illustration of the opportunity that, even in these days, awaits the young man who does his job well.

From the hour of his renomination President Taft steadily insisted that his secretary was the right man to head the national committee, and after a little consideration of the character of Mr. Hilles the seasoned politicians reached the same decision.

Who is Mr. Hilles and why has he succeeded where his predecessors have consistently failed? By what art does he succeed as secretary to the president, recognized as the most difficult official billet in Washington? Why does the president prefer him as a leader in the campaign? NATIONAL CAPITAL AFFAIRS

Camel Hump and Giraffe Sway at the Capital

WASHINGTON.—In a furtive sort of way people have taken note of the "camel hump walk." It's here. It came to Pennsylvania avenue rather gradually, but by much quicker process than that by which the aboriginal man stopped walking on all fours; for it traces its ancestry back to the hobble skirt and no farther.

Just as we used to have the "kangaroo walk," we now have the "camel-hump walk."

The camel-hump walk is nature's way of adapting itself to the sheath skirt. It is nature's law and probably the very best nature could do under the circumstances.

It will be seen by careful attention to the pictures that the genuine camel-hump is nothing more nor less than an attempt on the part of the hobbled female to get away from what is coming behind her, a direct application of the theory that self-preservation is one of the primal instincts of humanity. The peculiar effect is due to the tendency of the upper portion of the torso to advance a little faster than the hobbled extremities.

The hobble skirt, being true to its name, deters the legs in their desire for freedom. The right leg says to its colleague, "May I pass?" Not to be outdone in politeness, the left leg answers, "Why, my dear, of course; but I warn you that you will not be able to go far. Your career necessarily will be somewhat limited."

"Cat!" exclaims the right leg, and fares forth confidently, only to come up against that hobble like a colt at the end of its tether.

There is also the "giraffe sway," which is a variation of the camel-hump employed by slender girls only.

The complement of these two actions is the "wideawake sit." The name originates with the tendency of the ankles and feet to come right out and greet you in broad daylight. The toes no longer peep from out of the folds of a tailored gown; there are no folds.

Famous Stockbridge Indians Are to Go West

DECIDING to abandon their tribal form of government and adopt the white man's way of doing things, the remnant of the Stockbridge tribe of Indians, numbering 600 men, women and children, will shortly become citizens of Wisconsin and cease to be under the supervision and guardianship of the federal government.

The Stockbridge Indians will have a whole township to themselves, east of Lake Winnebago, and other land that the government intends giving them. Already they are planning the organization of a town government, and they have written to various federal and state officials about the state for information respecting civil government, parliamentary practice and whatever else may be useful to them in solving the problems before them.

Originally the Stockbridge Indians were a part of the Mohican confederacy and were known under the name of Housatonic.

The French and Indian war, which broke out in 1754, marked the beginning of the decline of the Stockbridges. They sided with the French and thus aroused the ire of many other Indian tribes.

Their number reduced to a beggarly band of 200 and their villages pillaged and burned by their enemies, it was with joy that they accepted the invitation in 1785 to join the Oneidas in Oneida and Madison counties, New York.

The Interior Department has given its approval of the plan, and the Stockbridges are planning to lay aside soon the blanket, tepee and other marks of "the only real American," and take up the white man's duties.

Chinese Are Happy Over the New Issue of Bills

WASHINGTON'S Chinatown eagerly awaits the appearance of the new paper money of the Chinese republic. Chop suey restauranteurs, dealers in celestial teas and spices and bric-a-brac and the vanders who line lower Pennsylvania avenue are all on the qui vive of anticipation.

Bankers, particularly those who have accounts with Chinamen and with Americans now traveling or living in China, are also interested in the new money, which is now being manufactured in New York and which is expected to make an appearance shortly in Chinese circles in this country.

Local Chinamen say that a great compliment has been paid to the United States by the celestial republic in that the standard of value of the new money is the American dollar. One side of the notes will be printed in Chinese, the other in English. It will be extremely easy to exchange American money for Chinese and vice versa.

The money is the first issue of paper by the new Chinese republic, and is made primarily to retire the money of the old empire, which also was printed in the United States and bore the portrait of the Chinese diplomat, Li Hung Chang.

Upon the new bills will be found the portrait, not of Li Hung Chang, but of the Philosopher Menizes, who is held second only to Confucius in the estimation of the Chinese. The bills are in denominations of $1, $5, $50 and $100.

China, of all nations, was the first to use paper money. As early as the second century paper money was used by the Chinese, but in the fifteenth century the Chinese minister of finance abolished it, and not until the latter part of the nineteenth century was it resumed.

Uncle Sam Opens Another National Playground

GLACIER PARK NOW OPEN
THIS PARK WILL MAKE A BIG HIT

THREE years ago congress passed a law setting aside a tract of 1,575 square miles in northwestern Montana of the wildest country on this continent to be kept as a national park and playground and game preserve. The park has now just been opened for the season, and it will remain open for visitors until October 15. For eight months of the year it is practically inaccessible, as snow blocks the mountain passes. There are as yet but few roads, and tourists have to do most of their traveling on horseback over rude trails.

Glacier National park is so named from the fact that within its borders there are upwards of sixty living glaciers. These glaciers feed numerous streams which go plunging through gorges of the wildest grandeur. There are nearly 300 lakes, the largest of which is Lake McDonald, covering over ten square miles and being over 3,000 feet above sea level. Mount Cleveland is the highest mountain—10,435 feet—but there are scores of other peaks of huge size, many of which are very grotesque in shape. One of the most curious is a great cliff which has been dubbed "Heaven's Fold." Here the strata of rock formation have been doubled and crushed in a very striking way, and the height from the valley is over 200 feet. White goats are numerous in the region. They have worn trails around cliffs which rise vertically from the valleys, and they tread these precarious paths with apparently no idea of fear. Travelers who like to try their mountain-climbing abilities will have plenty of work before them here. It will take years to explore the whole region, and every party that goes through reports interesting new discoveries.

SLEEPING IN CHURCH.

It is a matter of common experience that bright lights in a chamber, church, or hall where numerous persons are gathered together have the effect of producing drowsiness among certain members of the congregation or audience, says the Philadelphia Press. This phenomenon is easily explained by the current knowledge of hypnotism. The drowsiness produced by the lights is a species of hypnosis. It has been suggested also that lack of proper ventilation causes a toxic quality in the atmosphere to which some people are especially susceptible, the result being an irresistible drowsiness. Sleeping in church has always been a ready subject for humor. It is related that on one occasion when a proposal was under discussion to have a series of sermons preached on topics of the day which were agitating the public minds, Rufus Choate, as a member of the congregation, protested vehemently, saying, "I seek my pew, as I seek my bed, for repose." There is also an anecdote of an old Scotchman who was asked if he knew a certain man in the same neighborhood. "Know him?" he replied with emphasis. "Why, I've sleepit in the same kirk wi' him for forr-ty year." But the majority of preachers have never been inclined to take a humorous view of the matter, any more than Dean Swift.

"The law does not permit a man to leave his wife just because she nags him," Justice Marean decides. He meant, of course, the law of this state, says the New York Mail. In Kentucky, Missouri and other states, "ungovernable temper" and "indignities" are a cause not only for separation, but for absolute divorce and nagging may certainly be carried to the point of indignity; while in Oregon one may obtain a divorce if the partner of one's joys, and especially of one's sorrows, 'makes life burdensome." And what can be more burdensome than nagging? However there ought not to be divorce, nor even separation, for nagging, because no court of justice can ever be sure that the nagging is not justified, or at least provoked. Some women, for instance, are born naggers. Some achieve nagging, and a considerable number of others have nagging thrust upon them by a course of conduct which may be outwardly courteous, but which in its essence is insupportably irritating.

Boston is to have a hospital for "the blues," the first of the kind in the world. The institution will be psychopathic, though markedly different in scope from the wards of that name attached to Bellevue hospital in New York city. The hospital for "the blues" will be a branch of the Boston State hospital and will be conducted on the theory that all insanity cases are simply forms of physical sickness which can be alleviated with proper treatment. To that end the place will be a sort of clearing-house for those whose brains are out of gear. They will be differentiated and classified, according to the kinds of mental diseases they show, and remedies will be sought for each class of patients. There will be an out-patient department, for dealing with incipient insanity, and it is expected that this branch of the work will afford striking opportunities for the relief of many mildly insane persons without subjecting them to the stigma of insanity.

A Yonkers policeman saved about 20 people from death or injury when he picked up a dynamite bomb placed against a hotel and pinched out the fuse, which was within an inch of the explosion point. ROOSEVELT AND JOHNSON ARE NOMINATED

Religious Songs Sung as Ticket Is Named.

Candidates Thank Convention and Pledge to Work Untiringly for Victory of the New Party.

Jane Addams, Women's Representative Helps.

Is Among Those to Second Ex-President's Nomination.—Colonel and Governor Praise Each Other.

Chicago. — Singing "Onward Christian Soldiers," and the "Battle Hymn of the Republic," the delegates to the first national convention of the new Progressive party proclaimed Theodore Roosevelt of New York as their candidate for president, and Governor Hiram W. Johnson of California as their choice for vice-president.

Marking a new departure in the proceedings of national conventions, the two candidates immediately were informally notified of their nomination and in the midst of deafening cheers appeared before the delegates to voice their acceptance and pledge their best effort to the coming campaign.

For several long hours during the afternoon and early evening the big throng in the Coliseum had listened to a flow of oratory in nominating and seconding speeches in which the dominant note expressed was the belief that victory would come to the new party in the November elections.

Raymond Robbins of Illinois pledged a 100,000 majority for the national ticket in Illinois and Gifford Pinchot predicted a 400,000 majority for Colonel Roosevelt and Governor Johnson in his home state of Pennsylvania.

These statements were cheered to the echo.

The party formally christened itself "The Progressive party,", leaving out the prefix "national," by which it heretofore was known, but provision was made for the cognition of "real" Progressives in any of the states of whatever name they should be locally designated because of the state laws.

The convention adjourned at 7:24 p. m. with the delegates singing the Doxology.

During the three days it was in session there was not a single roll call, nor a ballot taken. The delegates asked no such formalities either in placing their candidates in nomination or in voting for them. There was not a voice in opposition either to Colonel Roosevelt or Governor Johnson. The delay in nominating them was due to the large number of seconding speeches allowed.

As has always been the case in national political conventions, the bulk of the work of the Progressive gathering was carried on in the committees. The only semblance of a conflict of opinion on the floor was a brief debate as to whether or not an hour's recess should be taken.

The point was not material, but, as one delegate expressed it, "we just had to fight about something to make it a regular convention."

There was sharp discussion, however, in several of the committee meetings and no little difficulty adopted. Colonel Roosevelt worked with the sub-committee in charge of the platform, going over their work and vigorously helping to mould the draft which at last proved acceptable to him. The platform did not take up the negro question.

In this connection, one the interesting seconding seeches of the day was that of F. R. Gleed of New York, a negro. Gleed declared that the negroes had faith in the new party, faith that it would do all in its power to right the wrongs of the race.

"We stand by the platform," he said, "we stand by Colonel Roosevelt's letter; we stand by his speech. And as we stood by him at San Juan Hill, so we will stand by you in November and fight for victory."

Miss Jane Addams of Hull House Chicago, was among those who seconded Colonel Roosevelt and she was enthusiastically greeted.

The new party formally placed itself on record as favoring equal suffrage and further recognized the woman suffrage movement by providing for four women members at large on the national committee.

Colonel Roosevelt, in his seech of acceptance said:

"Mr. Chairman and men and women who in this convention represent the high and honest purpose of the people of all of our country; I come forward to thank you from my heart for the honor you have conferred upon me and to say that of course I accept."

Colonel Roosevelt's name was placed in nomination by Prendergast, of New York. The colonel's speech of acceptance was short and to the point.

In speaking of his running mate, Mr. Roosevelt said:

"In Governor Johnson we have a man whose every word is made good by the deeds that he has done. The man who as the head of a great state has practically applied in that state for the benefit of the people of that state the principles which we intend to apply throughout the union as a whole. We have nominated the only type of man we ever ought to be nominated for the vice presidency; we have nominated a man fit at the moment to be president of the United States."

THEODORE ROOSEVELT.

To which Gov. Johnson, when he arose to accept this nomination replied:

"There is a new era, a new fight, a new struggle that is abroad now, a political creed that this great man, Colonel Roosevelt, preached even when he was in the White House; the great creed of all human kind, of giving to every child in the race of life an equal start; it is the creed in the last analysis of humanity that is now the creed of one of the great national parties in the United State of America.

"If in one little particle, if in one small degree, I may lighten the burden of this great man, this brave fighter who is today doing the greatest and the bravest thing in his career, then I shall feel well repaid in this campaign.

"I would rather go down to defeat with Theodore Roovelet than to go to victory with any other presidential candidate."

Chicago, Ill. — With his task as pilot of the convention ended, Colonel Roosevelt plunged at once into what he expects to be the hardest campaign of his career. He was in high spirits and said jubilantly that everything had turned out just right.

"We've got a great platform. Everything is fine, by George!" he exclaimed.

The colonel took dinner with Governor Johnson and Mrs. Roosevelt and went over, with his running mate, the general lines along which the fight is to be made. Then the candidates met the national committee and the discussion continued till late at night.

When the conference was over a general plan of action for the whole country had been agreed upon.

The negro question was finally strengthened out, it was said, after the colonel had met a dozen negroes from southern states to whom seats in the convention had been refused. Molison of Vicksburg, Miss., and Harris of Petersburg, Miss., did most of the talking, and Harris said that "everything had been smoothed out."

Others said, however, that there were still some among them who were not willing to accept Colonel Roosevelt's position.

Earlier in the day Col. Roosevelt met the members of the resolution committee to thank them for their work. He had spent most of the day rewriting a number of planks and it was learned that some sharp differences of opinion developed.

Coliseum, Chicago.—At 1:50 p. m. Controller Prendergast, of New York, placed Roosevelt in nomination. Colonel Roosevelt had announced in advance that his speech of acceptance would be very brief, not over five minutes.

Several new banners bearing the words, "Pass Prosperity Around," taken from former Senator Beveridge's keynote speech, were hung along the balcony rails in the hall.

The first floor debate of the convention was precipitated when the leaders, waiting for the completion of the platform, proposed a recess of an hour. Many of the delegates objected to this plan. They wanted to go ahead with the nominating speeches. The convention, however, adjourned.

A final draft of the platform containing changes suggested by Colonel Roosevelt was completed before the committee recessed until 2 p. m. This final draft contained 4,000 words. It was taken to Roosevelt's rooms during the recess and when read the committee will make ready to present it to the convention.

ALBERT J. BEVERIDGE

When the convention was again called to order at 1:20 p. m., Medill McCormick for the rules committee read a compromise plank naming the party the Progressive party, but agreeing that where states adopted the National Progressive it be approved. The rule to give one representative for each 10,000 voters was amended to one for each 5,000. The rules were then adopted without opposition.

The new national committee of the Progressive party, which takes place of the provincial committee in charge up to this time, was named by the various state delegations. The membership of the new committee is:

Joseph Thompson, Alabama; J. F. Cleevelend, Arizona; H. K. Cochren, Arkansas; Chester H. Rowell, California; B. B. Lindsey, Colorado; Joseph W. Alzoh, Connecticut; Louis A. Drexler, Delaware; C. M. McClure, Georgia; P. M. Smock, Idaho; Rudolph G. Leeds, Indiana; John L. Stevens, Iowa; William Allen White, Kansas; Leslie M. Combs, Kentucky; Pearl Wright, Louisiana; Albert P. Gardner, Maine; Matthew Hale, Massachusetts; E. C. Carrington, Jr., Maryland; Henry M. Wallace, Michigan; Milton D. Purdy, Minnesota; Wm. H. Walker, Missouri; B. F. Fridge, Mississippi; Joseph M. Dixon, Montana; Nathan Merriam, Nebraska; P. L. Flannigan, Nevada; William Savacool, New Hampshire; John Franklin Fort, New Jersey; Miguel A. Otero, New Mexico; J. N. Williamson, North Carolina; A. Y. More, North Dakota; J. J. Sullivan, Ohio; George J. Priestley, Oklahoma; H. W. Coe, Oregon; Edwin F. Tuttle, Rhode Island; R. S. Vessey, South Dakota; G. Thomas Taylor, Tennessee; Cecil A. Lyon, Texas; M. Henler, Utah; Thomas Lee Moore, Virginia; Charles H. Thompson, Vermont; H. F. Cochems, Wisconsin; Robert D. Carey, Wyoming; M. M. O. Dawson, West Virginia.

Judge Ben B. Lindsey of Denver, a former Democrat, was early agreed upon as permanent chairman of the convention. Colonel Roosevelt endorsed the recommendation of Judge Lindsey and the plan had been enthusiastically approved by the delegates.

Later, however, Judge Lindsey called on the colonel and had a long talk with him. He said he had been suffering from asthma and did not feel physically capable of taking up the work. Under the circumstances, Colonel Roosevelt agreed to release him and while it had not been finally decided, it was said to be likely that former Senator Albert Beveridge of Indiana, the temporary chairman, would be continued as permanent presiding officer.

When Colonel Roosevelt reached Chicago he put in a stormy two hours before he succeeded in straightening out the tangle over the contesting negro delegates from the South. After he had been welcomed by a crowd of several thousand persons and had made a speech on the street in front of his hotel, he went to his headquarters and took the helm.

Colonel Roosevelt declared that, although it might cost him votes in the northern states, he believed it was to the best interests of the party to proceed under white leadership in the South.

Colonel Roosevelt contends that the Republican delegates from Southern states, in which the party has only a nominal existence, were used in the national convention last June to defeat the wishes of the party in the strong Republican states as expressed at the primaries.

Crowds in hotel corridors and lobbies were nearly as large and quite as noisy as those during the Republican national convention.

Hundreds of delegates and their friends, fantastically decked out with bandana handkerchiefs and pictures of Colonel Roosevelt, marched about singing Roosevelt songs and shouting Roosevelt yells of many kinds.

The committee on platform got into a lively row soon after organization was perfected and some pretty plain words were spoken in discussing the proposed declaration of principles of the new party.

Soon after the committee met the draft of a tentative platform was presented by a group of leaders in the new movement, who had met several times to discuss the matter. The draft was said to express the combined ideas of Dean Lewis of the law school of the University of Pennsylvania; Dean Kirchwey of the law school of Columbia University; Gifford Pinchot, Chester Rowell of California, Charles McCarthy, and other progressives.

Contesting negro delegates from Florida and Mississippi were barred from the Progressive convention by the national committee. The contests were decided at a stormy executive session of the committee that lasted for three hours just before the convention met.

While the committee deliberated, the negroes gathered in the corridors outside the committee room and raised voices in indignant protest. When the decisions were made known the negro leaders declared they would continue their fight for seats before the credentials committee of the convention.

Colonel Roosevelt and his party arrived here on the Twentieth Century limited at 8:55 a. m. Monday. A crowd of 5,000 persons filled the station and thronged the streets just outside. Wild cheering greeted the colonel as he passed through the station and a demonstration started when he stepped onto the sidewalk to get in an automobile and proceed to the Congress hotel.

Heckled by Spectator.

Colonel Roosevelt during his "confession of faith" at the convention was heckled by a spectator who interrupted with the demand:

"What about the negro question?"

Instantly the convention was in an uproar, but Colonel Roosevelt silenced those of his friends who objected to the question and with the statement that no one could ask him a question he was afraid of, the colonel then proceeded at some length to state his views on the negro question.

He declared he hoped conditions might improve in the South that at Southern Progressive conventions those states might send as delegates negroes who would have the character and standing of the negro delegates from West Virginia, who, he asserted, were in those respects the equal of their white associates.

In taking the stand he did to bar the negroes sent from the South as contesting delegates to the present convention, Colonel Roosevelt asserted he was stifling in advance a condition which had led to "the crushing disaster and death of the great Republican party itself."

The report of the credentials committee, unanimously adopted, contained a resolution recognizing "the constitutional and inherent right of each and every state to determine the qualifications and manner of election of its delegates to national conventions.

This resolution was regarded as giving the Southern states the right to choose delegates as they pleased. It also was interpreted as not imposing the direct primary system upon any of the states participating in the conventions of the new party. In replying to the interruption as to the negro question, Colonel Roosevelt said:

"Any respectful request for information I will always have an answer for. During my administration I never did anything I was afraid to be questioned about and I shall not begin to in the Progressive party.

"There has been distributed here a letter which I wrote to Julian Harris three or four days ago. In that letter I set forth my views in detail, and I think with a clearness that will prevent any misapprehension, but I can give you by example just what I mean by the policy I am advocating.

"I think the American people is a mighty good people to lead and a mighty poor people to drive. I think we can get the best results from our fellow Americans in other sections of the country by treating them as we expect them to treat us and by ourselves living up, in our own homes, to the principles that we profess.

"In Republican national conventions, hitherto, there has been a large representation of colored men, all from non-Republican states, the virtue of the Republicans of the Republican states taking only the form of trying to make the Democratic states be good. Do you see what I mean? The colored delegates all come from the states that have cast a Republican electoral vote that never elected a colored man to office, where, largely owing to the action participated in for 45 years by the Republican party, the colored man has, as a matter of fact, gradually lost all his political rights.

According to figures compiled by the assessor of Ramsey county Mrs. Humbird will pay taxes next spring on personal property valued at $291,750.

With a lengthy written confession of "Bald Jack" Rose as a basis, private detectives went to work today to secure corroboration.

The firing this time occurred almost opposite the El Paso smelter, northwest of El Paso, three or four miles from the spot where the firing occurred last week when shots were exchanged. WILSON IS TOLD HE IS NOMINEE

Democratic Candidate Gives His Ideas on Way Nation Should Be Governed.

SEES TWO BIG THINGS TO DO

Would Set Up Rule of Justice and Right in Handling Tariff, Trusts, Etc., and Protect Our People and Our Resources.

Sea Girt, N. J., Aug. 7.—Governor Woodrow Wilson today received the committee which came to the "little White House" to notify him of his nomination for the presidency by the Democratic party. Chairman Ollie James headed the committee and delivered the speech of notification.

In reply Governor Wilson, after thanking the committee, commented on the unusual nature of the coming campaign in which the candidates must address an awakened nation, impatient of partisan make-believe and never more susceptible to unselfish appeals or to the high arguments of sincere justice. The forces of the nation, he said, are asserting themselves against every form of special privilege and private control, and are seeking bigger things than they have ever heretofore achieved.

Two Great Things to Do.

"How do we expect to handle each of the great matters that must be taken up by the next congress and the next administration?" said Mr. Wilson, and he answered his own query as follows:

What is there to do? It is hard to sum the great task up, but apparently this is the sum of the matter: There are two great things to do. One is to set up the rule of justice and of right in such matters as the tariff, the regulation of the trusts and the prevention of monopoly, the adaptation of our banking and currency laws to the varied uses to which our people must put them, the treatment of those who do the daily labor in our factories and mines throughout all our great industrial and commercial undertakings, and the political life of the people of the Philippines, for whom we hold governmental power in trust, for their service, not our own. The other, the additional duty is the great task of protecting our people and our resources and of keeping open to the whole people the doors of opportunity through which they must, generation by generation, pass if they are to make conquest of their fortunes in health, in freedom, in peace, and in contentment. In the performance of this second great duty we are face to face with questions of conservation and of development, questions of forests and water powers and mines and water ways, of the building of an adequate merchant marine, and the opening of every highway and facility and the setting up of every safeguard needed by a great industrious, expanding nation.

These are all great matters upon which everybody should be heard. We have got into trouble in recent years chiefly because these large things, which ought to have been handled by taking counsel with as large a number of persons as possible, because they touched every interest and the life of every class and region, have in fact been too often handled in private conference. Our difficulty is not that wicked and designing men have plotted against us, but that our common affairs have been determined upon too narrow a view, and by too private an initiative. Our task now is to effect a great readjustment and get the forces of the whole people once more into play. We need no revolution; we need no excited change; we need only a new point of view and a new method and spirit of counsel.

We are servants of the people, the whole people. The nation has been unnecessarily, unreasonably at war within itself. Interest has clashed with interest when there were common principles of right and of fair dealing which might and should have bound them all together, not as rivals, but as partners. As the servants of all, we are bound to undertake the great duty of accommodation and adjustment.

Revision of the Tariff.

Coming to the tariff question, the governor said the schedules "have been made up for the purpose of keeping as large a number as possible of the rich and influential manufacturers of the country in a good humor with the Republican party, which desired their constant financial support. The tariff has become a system of favors, which the phraseology of the schedule was often deliberately contrived to conceal."

Reasserting the Democratic conviction that the only legitimate object of tariff duties is to raise revenue for the support of the government, he continued:

There should be an immediate revision, and it should be downward, unhesitatingly and steadily downward. It should begin with the schedules which have been most obviously used to kill competition and to raise prices in the United States, arbitrarily and without regard to the prices pertaining elsewhere in the markets of the world; and it should, before it is finished or intermitted, be extended to every item in every schedule [illegible] ciaries, or for subsidized control of any kind in the markets or the enterprises of the country; until special favors of every sort have been absolutely withdrawn and every part of our laws of taxation shall have been transformed from a system of governmental patronage into a system of just and reasonable charges which shall fall where they will create the least burden. When we shall have done that, we can fix questions of revenue and of business adjustment in a new spirit and with clear minds. We shall then be partners with all the business men of the country, and a day of freer, more stable prosperity shall have dawned.

Control of the Trusts.

The governor spoke of how recent investigations have revealed the connection between the tariff and the movement of prices, and this brought him to the subject of trusts, concerning which he said in part:

I am not one of those who think that competition can be established by law against the drift of a world-wide economic tendency; neither am I one of those who believe that business done upon a great scale by a single organization—call it corporation, or what you will—is necessarily dangerous to the liberties, even the economic liberties, of a great people like our own, full of intelligence and of indomitable energy. I am not afraid of anything that is normal. I dare say we shall never return to the old order of individual competition, and that the organization of business upon a great scale of co-operation is, up to a certain point, itself normal and inevitable.

Power in the hands of great business men does not make me apprehensive, unless it springs out of advantages which they have not created for themselves. Big business is not dangerous because it is big, but because its bigness is an unwholesome inflation created by privileges and exemptions which it ought not to enjoy. While competition cannot be created by statutory enactment, it can in large measure be revived by changing the laws and forbidding the practices that killed it, and by enacting laws that will give it heart and occasion again. We can arrest and prevent monopoly. It has assumed new shapes and adopted new processes in our time, but these are now being disclosed and can be dealt with.

Concentration of Credit.

But the problem and the difficulty are much greater than that. There are not merely great trusts and combinations which are to be controlled and deprived of their power to create monopolies and destroy rivals; there is something bigger still than they are and more subtle, more evasive, more difficult to deal with. There are vast confederacies (as I may perhaps call them for the sake of convenience) of banks, railways, express companies, insurance companies, manufacturing corporations, mining corporations, power and development companies and all the rest of the circle, bound together by the fact that the ownership of their stock and the members of their boards of directors are controlled and determined by comparatively small and closely interrelated groups of persons who, by their informal confederacy, may control, if they please and when they will, both credit and enterprise.

There is nothing illegal about these confederacies, so far as I can perceive. They have come about very naturally, generally without plan or deliberation, rather because there was so much money to be invested and it was in the hands, at great financial centers, of men acquainted with one another and intimately associated in business, than because anyone had conceived and was carrying out a plan of general control; but they are none the less potent a force in our economic and financial system on that account. They are part of our problem. Their very existence gives rise to the suspicion of a "money trust," a concentration of the control of credit which may at any time become infinitely dangerous to free enterprise. If such a concentration and control does not actually exist, it is evident that it can easily be set up and used at will. Laws must be devised which will prevent this, if laws can be worked out by fair and free counsel that will accomplish that result without destroying or seriously embarrassing any sound or legitimate business undertaking or necessary and wholesome arrangement.

Question of Conservation.

Of conservation and allied matters Governor Wilson said:

I do not know any greater question than that of conservation. We have been a spendthrift nation and must now husband what we have left. We must do more than that. We must develop, as well as preserve, our water powers and must add great waterways to the transportation facilities of the nation, to supplement the railways within our borders as well as upon the Isthmus. We must revive our merchant marine, too, and fill the seas again with our own fleets. We must add to our present postoffice service a parcels post as complete as that of any other nation. We must look to the health of our people upon every hand, as well as hearten them with justice and opportunity.

There are many sides to these great matters. Conservation is easy to generalize about, but hard to particularize about wisely. Reservation is not the whole conservation. Development of great states must not be stayed indefinitely to await a policy by which our forests and water powers can prudently be made use of. Use and development must go hand in hand. The policy we adopt must be progressive, not negative merely, as if we [illegible] ways and the building up of a merchant marine, we must follow great constructive lines and not fall back upon the cheap device of bounties and subsidies. In the case of the Mississippi river, that great central artery of our trade, it is plain that the federal government must build and maintain the levees and keep the great waters in harness for the general use. It is plain, too, that vast sums of money must be spent to develop new waterways where trade will be most served and transportation most readily cheapened by them. Such expenditures are no largess on the part of the government; they are national investments.

Merchant Marine.

The question of a merchant marine turns back to the tariff again, to which all roads seem to lead, and to our registry laws, which, if coupled with the tariff, might almost be supposed to have been intended to take the American flag off the seas. Bounties are not necessary, if you will but undo some of the things that have been done. Without a great merchant marine we cannot take our rightful place in the commerce of the world. Merchants who must depend upon the carriers of rival mercantile nations to carry their goods to market are at a disadvantage in international trade too manifest to need to be pointed out; and our merchants will not long suffer themselves—ought not to suffer themselves—to be placed at such a disadvantage. Our industries have expanded to such a point that they will burst their jackets, if they cannot find a free outlet to the markets of the world; and they cannot find such an outlet unless they be given ships of their own to carry their goods—ships that will go the routes they want them to go—and prefer the interests of America in their sailing orders and their equipment. Our domestic markets no longer suffice. We need foreign markets. That is another force that is going to break the tariff down. The tariff was once a bulwark; now it is a dam. For trade is reciprocal; we cannot sell unless we also buy.

The very fact that we have at last taken the Panama canal seriously in hand and are vigorously pushing it towards completion is eloquent of our re-awakened interest in international trade. We are not building the canal and pouring out million upon million of money upon its construction merely to establish a water connection between the two coasts of the continent, important and desirable as that may be, particularly from the point of view of naval defense. It is meant to be a great international highway. It would be a little ridiculous if we should build it and then have no ships to send through it. There have been years when not a single ton of freight passed through the great Suez canal in an American bottom, so empty are the seas of our ships and seamen. We must mean to put an end to that kind of thing or we would not be cutting a new canal at our very doors merely for the use of our men-of-war. We shall not manage the revival by the mere paltry device of tolls. We must build and buy ships in competition with the world. We can do it if we will but give ourselves leave.

There is another duty which the Democratic party has shown itself great enough and close enough to the people to perceive, the duty of government to share in promoting agricultural, industrial, vocational education in every way possible within its constitutional powers. No other platform has given this intimate vision of a party's duty.

Free to Serve the People.

In concluding the governor said:

A presidential campaign may easily degenerate into a mere personal contest and so lose its real dignity and significance. There is no indispensable man. The government will not collapse and go to pieces if any one of the gentlemen who are seeking to be entrusted with its guidance should be left at home. But men are instruments. We are as important as the cause we represent, and in order to be important must really represent a cause. What is our cause? The people's cause? That is easy to say, but what does it mean? The common as against any particular interest whatever? Yes, but that, too, needs translation into acts and policies. We represent the desire to set up an unentangled government, a government that cannot be used for private purposes, either in the field of business or in the field of politics; a government that will not tolerate the use of the organization of a great party to serve the personal aims and ambitions of any individual, and that will not permit legislation to be employed to further any private interest. It is a great conception, but I am free to serve it, as you also are. I could not have accepted a nomination which left me bound to any man or any group of men. No man can be just who is not free; and no man who has to show favors ought to undertake the solemn responsibility of government in any rank or post whatever, least of all in the supreme post of president of the United States.

To be free it is not necessarily to be wise. But wisdom comes with counsel, with the frank and free conference of untrammeled men united in the common interest. Should I be entrusted with the great office of president, I would seek counsel wherever it could be had upon free terms. I know the temper of the great convention which nominated me; I know the temper of the country that lay back of that convention and spoke through it. I heed with deep thankfulness the message you bring me from it. I feel that I am surrounded by men whose principles [illegible]

DISORDERED DIGESTION

If Neglected May Develop into a Severe Form of Stomach Trouble.

The Best Safeguard Is to Keep the Stomach Toned Up and the Treatment Should Be Begun When the First Symptom Is Noted.

"A few years ago," says Mrs. George Faliu, of Finleyson, Minn., "I began to suffer from stomach trouble. It came on me gradually and I do not know what caused it. I gave little heed to it at the time, thinking that it was merely a slight attack of indigestion. It finally developed into a severe form of stomach trouble and I suffered terribly for months.

"At the beginning of my sickness I had fainting spells and became unconscious. There was gas on my stomach, my appetite was very poor and what little I ate did not seem to be digested. I was sick at my stomach a great deal and had severe dizzy attacks. I had hot flashes when it would seem as though I was burning up. I could not sleep night or day during these spells unless I took something to ease the pain. I was very weak and was in this condition for six months. I could not do any work and was confined to bed for two or three days at a time.

"A doctor at Duluth said I had gastric fever. He did not give me much help so I tried Dr. Williams' Pink Pills upon my mother's advice. I gave the pills a thorough trial and unlike the doctor's medicine, they agreed with me. I took several boxes of the pills and was entirely cured. I think so much of the pills that I always keep them in the house."

The tonic treatment with Dr. Williams' Pink Pills by building up the blood so that it can nourish and strengthen the weakened digestive system has made hundreds of cures in the most severe stomach disorders. This record of cures should merit a trial for the remedy which is guaranteed free from opiates.

HER LITTLE HAND IN HIS

Mr. Pecke's Explanation as to Reason Somewhat Dispelled the Odor of Romance.

Henne and Pecke were two henpecked married men. The other day they met, and, after a few casual remarks concerning the weather, the subject of women and unfortunate husbands was—perhaps naturally—discussed. To Henne, however, suddenly came thoughts of years ago, when he was a happy bachelor, and (unconscious of what Fate had in store for him) was "walking out" a girl who was, later on, destined to bring him sorrow and misery.

Pecke, seeing a "far-away" look in his companion's eyes, inquired the meaning. Henne retorted dramatically, "I was just then thinking, old fellow, of those happy days long ago—when I used to hold that girl's hand in mine for hours—when—"

But the equally unfortunate Pecke suddenly cut his companion short by exclaiming: "Why, that's nothing! Cheer up! Do you know, only yesterday I held my wife's hand for three solid hours."

"What?" said the startled Henne.

"Yes, it's a fact," resumed Pecke, sorrowfully; "and I declare if I'd let loose she'd have killed me."—London Tit-Bits.

Lacks Originality.

"I hope its perusal will inspire him with some new thoughts. Nobody talks about the weather more than Bilkins does."

THE SUNBEAM.

Published every Friday, at Sunbeam, Pennington County, Minnesota.

Oklee, Lambert & Co., the new town on the Soo line, report the sudden disappearance of the new newspaper editor, who left suddenly without telling where he was going. This is the second editor that has made his pile at Oklee.

J. M. Bishop is a candidate for the republican nomination for county attorney. He is a man who is well qualified for the position and has made a host of friends in this territory through his courteous treatment of settlers making final proof. We have heard that E.M.Stanton will be a candidate for reelection.

County Auditor A. H. Fasel is a candidate for renomination, and it would certainly be a mistake for the tax payers of this new county to make any change in this important office at this time, as he is a man that you can not beat for qualifications and do not find his eaqul of every day.

The News Press goes a little out of their way to advise people to not vote for nominees of the Socialist party for county office. There are some good men on that ticket would make good county officials, but the Socialists are tightning up the political party lines as none of the would vote fur either a democrat or republican.

Tho Thief River Falls Times says: 'It is conceded that the present governor has the inside track in Pennington county." Well now who would have thought to have looked at Mussey that he was a profit! But maybe he is. But it would be a disgrace to the intelligence of the people and retard settlement if Eberhart should go out of this County with even a plurality of votes. Again we say; if Thief River Falls owes Eberhart anything they had better pay him up before election and not disgrace this county, by showing that the people have no more sense than to vote for the reelection of a man to this high position of trust who has prostituted the office and shown to the people that he is the servant and tool of of the corporations.

If Rindahl gets the Democratic nomination for governor, and Eberhart the Republican, we would not make an X opposite either of their names, we would vote for the public ownership ticket or prohibition rather than to have the name of voting for such men for office. That Rindahl is the most bigoted Athiest in the state of Minnesota who firmly believes that any man who believes in any religion, as taught by any of the churches is a fool.

William E. Lee is not going to join the new Roosevelt party. This helps some on the variety of candidates for Governor. Now we have county optionists with Taft, Republican Candidates for Wilson the democratic nominee for President, and our own Sam. Gordon, who is a true blue Republican, who doesn't indorse Taft methods but will join the new Progressive party. We predict that when the votes are counted that Gordon will be the nominee. It is not much loss to the progressives to loose Lee. Let him go, join the Taft gang, as they are in the minority and need his help. Go to it Wm. You had ought to be able to ride into the Minnesota governors chair on Tafts coat tail.

In setting up the announcement of Andrew Trovaton, for county treasurer, we left out one portion of it by mistake. Read it over again as Mr.Trovaton has made a good official and is entitled to be heard in his position regarding his renomination and election by the voters of the county.

As the opponent of E. A. Mostue for Superintendent of schools belongs to the Socialst party, and is a member of the Thief River Falls club, we suppose Mostue will have to be contented with what few scattering votes he can pick up among the Republicans and Democrats.

FOR COUNTY TREASURER.

I wish to announce that I am a candidate for County Treasurer, subject to the ratification of the Republican voters at the primaries, September 17, 1912 Being that political parties have always regarded it as important to, have their members elected to all offices, it must be for aid in promoting party politics, for so far as the work in the county offices is concerned, it can make no difference whatever, what the officer,s political affiliations are, so the idea must be that he is expected to talk and work and use the advantage of his public position, in aiding the party to which he belongs. I believe that it is of the utmost importance to have the Republican party control at least one branch of congress in order to maintain the average of prices. While the price-level does not prove that times are good, theoretically, yet we know that with the enormous debt of the country, it will be harder to pay it with low prices than with high, steady prices. I believe that because one can not support the whole Republican ticket, it is no reason at all to quite supporting candidates for congress and the legislature, which is by far more important than the office of president, so far as party politics is concerned. These are my ideas, and I shall use my influence to help along on those lines, no matter whether I am nominated or not.

Sincerely for the success of the party.

Andrew Trovaton.

FOR SHERIFF.

I wish to announce that I am a candidate for the office of sheriff, subject to the will of the voters of Pennington county at the primaries. September 17. I have held the office one term, or since the organization of the county, having been appointed by the board of county commissioners. If my conduct of the affairs of the office have met with your approval, an endorsement at the primaries would be greatly appreciated.

Jesse La Bree.

COUNTY ATTORNEY.

I wish to announce to the voters of Pennington county that I am a candidate for the office of County Attorney on the Republican ticket, and solicit your vote and support at the primaries to be held on Sept. 17, 1912.—J. M. Bishop, Thief River Falls, Minn.

COUNTY TREASURER.

I am a candidate for the office of County Treasurer of Pennington County and solicit the support of the voters at the Republican primary election to be held on Sept. 17, 1912.—John [illegible] Gullingsrud, Thief River Falls.

JUDGE OF PROBATE.

We made a trip down to the setting dredge on ditch 47 last Sunday and found that the thing had moved 20 rods the past month. The boys that are running it now are doing very fair work and will probably get a few more rods dug before the ground freezes up this fall. But we know that there is no prospect to complete the ditch this year.

The oat crop puzzles the farmers as there seems to be two crops this year one from the main stalk and one from the stools. The first crop is now ripe and the stools green and which to cut crop is the question.

Now is the time of year to use the scythe a little and cut the tops from Canada thistles and other noxious weeds.

The basket social at the residence of M.E. Hyland in Deer Park Township last Saturday evening was largely attended, and a very pleasant time was enjoyed by all. The party was for the benefit of a young son of Knut Olson who met with an accident some time ago and must have an operation performed. The neat sum of $77.25 was raised from the sale of baskets, which will be given to Mr. Olson for the payment of the boys doctor bill.

Mr. and Mrs. Stephen Singer was visiting at Rhoda Wednesday. They made this office a pleasant call on their way home.

There is one thing that the farmers, who have fed the prairie chickens and partridges since the close of the game season last year should be very carefull about that is to not let their gun go off "accidently" and kill any game until the game season opens, State game and fish Commissioner Rider, Eberhart's tool for the corporations, is very particular about the farmers catching any game or fish out of season, but wants them to leave all the flocks of chickens full, so the city dudes and their trained dogs can get them all.

If you see one of Rider's game wardens sneaking around trying to catch some farmers shooting a prairie chicken a few days before the opening of the season, [illegible]

This is about the size of the respect that the farmers on upper Red Lake River have for our present game and fish commission, who are the hirelings and tools of the lumber companies and we have got the documents right in this office to prove that what we say is facts.

TESTED THE ANTS.

Experiments That Seem to Prove the Insects Have Memory.

Experiments are continually being made to test the memory of animals, such as the elephant, the dog, the bull, but it would seem a thankless undertaking to ascertain whether the ant has a memory. Nevertheless a scientist in South America thinks he has succeeded.

Isolating two of the largest specimens of tropical ants he could find, he so arranged their receptacle that they could get no food without climbing over a circular slant into another compartment. Over this slant when the food was not there he placed a crimson cord, and the ants very soon learned to interpret the signal and never attempted to climb over it.

Thinking after a time that there might be something in the color that repelled them automatically, as the bull is affected unpleasantly by red, he replaced the red cord by cords of varying colors, always with the same result after the ants had made a few excursions over the slant and come back hungry. Then he tried plain cloth and even paper, but the result was invariably the same. After a number of trials the ants refused to climb the slant when there was any sort of "signal."

Finally the scientist reversed the signal, having food beyond the slant only when it was visible, and after an indefinite number of trials the ants accommodated themselves to the change.—Harper's Weekly.

LABOUCHERE'S COPY.

After It Was Finished He Lost All Interest in Its Fate.

It was a matter of absolute indifference to Labouchere what became of what he wrote after he had written it. When he had corrected the proof or if he was away from England when he sent his copy to the post he took no further interest in it whatever.

Before I had discovered this trait in his character I used to write and apologize for cutting, perhaps six columns down to two, or sometimes offer an excuse for not using any of it at all. At last he wrote to me: "You need not sentimentalize about my stuff. I send it to you to do what you like with."

But one felt a lingering compunction long afterward about consigning the fruits of so much labor to the waste paper basket, and, after all, Labouchere was the proprietor of the paper. Once or twice, therefore, I have excused myself for "not sentimentalizing" about some article that he had sent.

One such occasion he writes: "Dear —: I am the only person, I believe, on the press who does not care in the least whether his lucubrations do or do not appear in print. It has always appeared to me that the making of an art (article) requires two persons, one to write it, the other to cut it down, and generally to cut out what the first man most admires."—London Truth.

Wanted His Money Back.

A young man had taken his wife to a show, and as there was no one to look after the baby they had brought it along. It cried lustily all through the first act. At the close of the act an usher came down the aisle and informed them that if they could not keep the baby quiet they would have to go to the box office, get their money back and go out.

They succeeded in squelching the baby, and all went well for a time.

Then, five minutes after the last act had commenced, the young father leaned over and said, "How do you like the show?"

"Rotten!" was the reply.

He was silent for a moment, and then leaning over again he whispered, "Stick a pin in the baby, Genevieve." [illegible]

SYNOPSIS.

Lieut. Harry Mallory is ordered to the Philippines. He and Marjorie Newton decide to elope, but wreck of taxicab prevents their seeing minister on the way to the train. Transcontinental train is taking on passengers. Porter has a lively time with an Englishman and Ira Lathrop, a Yankee business man. The elopers have an exciting time getting to the train. "Little Jimmie" Wellington, bound for Reno to get a divorce, boards train in maudlin condition. Later Mrs. Jimmie appears. She is also bound for Reno with same object. Likewise Mrs. Sammy Whitcomb. Latter blames Mrs. Jimmie for her marital troubles. Classmates of Mallory decorate bridal berth. Rev. and Mrs. Temple start on a vacation. They decide to cut loose and Temple removes evidence of his calling. Marjorie decides to let Mallory proceed alone, but train starts while they are lost in farewell. Passengers join Mallory's classmates in giving couple wedding hazing. Marjorie is distracted. Ira Lathrop, woman-hating bachelor, discovers an old sweetheart, Anne Gattle, a fellow passenger. Mallory vainly hunts for a preacher among the passengers.

CHAPTER XIII.

Hostilities Begin.

During Mallory's absence, Marjorie had met with a little adventure of her own. Ira Lathrop finished his re-encounter with Anne Gattle shortly after Mallory set out stalking clergymen. In the mingled confusion of finding his one romantic flame still glowing on a vestal altar, and of shocking her with an escape of profanity, he backed away from her presence, and sank into his own berth.

He realized that he was not alone. Somebody was alongside. He turned to find the great tear-spent eyes of Marjorie staring at him. He rose with a recrudescence of his woman-hating wrath, and dashing up the aisle, found the porter just returning from the baggage car. He seized the black factotum and growled:

"Say, porter, there's a woman in my berth."

The porter chuckled, incredulous:

"Woman in yo' berth!"

"Yes—get her out."

"Yassah," the porter nodded, and advanced on Marjorie with a gentle, "'Scuse me, missus—yo' berth is numbe one."

"I don't care," snapped Marjorie. "I won't take it."

"But this un belongs to that gentleman."

"He can have mine—ours—Mr. Mallory's," cried Marjorie, pointing to the white-ribboned tent in the farther end of the car. Then she gripped the arms of the seat, as if defying eviction. The porter stared at her in helpless chagrin. Then he shuffled back and murmured: "I reckon you'd betta put her out."

Lathrop withered the coward with one contemptuous look, and strode down the aisle with a determined grimness. He took his ticket from his pocket as a clinching proof of his title, and thrust it out at Marjorie. She gave it one indifferent glance, and then her eyes and mouth puckered, as if she had munched a green persimmon, and a long low wail like a distant engine-whistle, stole from her lips. Ira Lathrop stared at her in blank wrath, doddered irresolutely, and roared:

"Agh, let her have it!"

The porter smiled triumphantly, and said: "She says you kin have her berth." He pointed at the bridal arbor. Lathrop almost exploded at the idea.

Now he felt a hand on his shoulder, and turned to see Little Jimmie Wellington emerging from his berth with an enormous smile:

"Say, Pop, have you seen lovely rice-trap? Stick around till she flops."

But Lathrop flung away to the smoking room. Little Jimmie turned to the jovial negro:

"Porter, porter."

"I'm right by you."

"What time d'you say we get to Reno?"

"Mawnin' of the fo'th day, sah."

"Well, call me just before we roll in."

And he rolled in. His last words floated down the aisle and met Mrs. Little Jimmie Wellington just returning from the Women's Room, where she had sought nepenthe in more than one of her exquisite little cigars. The familiar voice, familiarly bibulous, smote her ear with amazement. She beckoned the porter to her anxiously.

"Porter! Porter! Do you know the name of the man who just hurried in?"

"No'm," said the porter. "I reckon he's so broken up he ain't got any name left—" turbing atmosphere of divorce. She was dreaming already with her eyes open, and she sank into number six in a lotus-eater's reverie.

Mrs. Wellington gathered certain things together and took up her hand-bag, to return to the Women's Room, just as Mrs. Whitcomb came forth from the curtains of her own berth, where she had made certain preliminaries to disrobing, and put on a light, decidedly negligee negligee.

The two women collided in the aisle, whirled on one another, as women do when they jostle, recognized each other with wild stares of amazement, set their teeth, and made a simultaneous dash along the corridor, shoulder wrestling with shoulder. They reached the door marked "Women" at the same instant, and as neither would have dreamed of offering the other a courtesy, they squeezed through together in a Kilkenny jamble.

CHAPTER XIV.

The Dormitory on Wheels.

Of all the shocking institutions in human history, the sleeping car is the most shocking—or would be, if we were not so used to it. There can be no doubt that we are the most moral nation on earth, for we admit it ourselves. Perhaps we prove it, too, by the Arcadian prosperity of these two-story hotels on wheels, where miscellaneous travelers dwell in complete promiscuity, and sleep almost side by side, in apartments, or compartments, separated only by a plank and a curtain, and guarded only by one sleepy negro.

After the fashion of the famous country whose inhabitants earned a meager sustenance by taking in each other's washing, so in Sleeping Carpathia we attain a meager respectability by everybody's chaperoning everybody else.

So topsy-turvied, indeed, are our notions, once we are aboard a train, that the staterooms alone are regarded with suspicion; we question the motives of those who must have a room to themselves!—a room with a real door! that locks! !

And, now, on this sleeping car, prettily named "Snowdrop," scenes were enacting that would have thrown our great-grandmothers into fits—scenes which, if we found them in France, or Japan, we should view with alarm as almost unmentionable evidence of the moral obliquity of those nations.

But this was our own country—the part of it which admits that it is the best part—the moralest part, the staunch middle west. This was Illinois. Yet dozens of cars were beholding similar immodesties in chastest Illinois, and all over the map, thousands of people, in hundreds of cars, were permitting total strangers to view preparations which have always, hitherto, been reserved for the most intimate and legalized relations.

The porter was deftly transforming the day-coach into a narrow lane entirely surrounded by draperies. Behind most of the portieres, fluttering in the lightest breeze, and perilously following the hasty passer-by, homely offices were being enacted. The population of this little town was going to bed. The porter was putting them to sleep as if they were children in a nursery, and he a black mammy.

The frail walls of little sanctums were bulging with the bodies of people disrobing in the aisle, with nothing between them and the beholder's eye but a clinging curtain that explained what it did not reveal. From apertures here and there disembodied feet were protruding and mysterious hands were removing shoes and other things.

Women in risky attire were scooting to one end of the car, and men in shirt sleeves, or less, were hastening to the other.

When Mallory returned to the "Snowdrop," his ear was greeted by the thud of dropping shoes. He found Marjorie being rapidly immured, like Poe's prisoner, in a jail of closing walls.

She was unspeakably ill at ease, and by the irony of custom, the one person on whom she depended for protection was the one person whose contiguity was most alarming—and all for lack of a brief trialogue, with a clergyman, as the tertium quid.

When Mallory's careworn face appeared round the edge of the partition now erected between her and the abode of Dr. and Mrs. Temple, Marjorie shivered anew, and asked with all anxiety:

"Did you find a minister?"

Perhaps the Recording Angel overlooked Mallory's answer: "Not a damn minister."

When he dropped at Marjorie's side she edged away from him, pleading: "Oh, what shall we do?"

He answered dismally and ineffectively: "We'll have to go on pretending to be—just friends."

"But everybody thinks we're married."

"That's so!" he admitted, with the imbecility of fatigued hope. They sat a while listening to the porter slipping sheets into place and thumping pillows into cases, a few doors down the street. He would be ready for them at any moment. Something must be done, but what? what?

CHAPTER XV.

A Premature Divorce.

Suddenly, Marjorie [illegible] gave a leap of joy. She was giving another [illegible]

[illegible] nothing better.

"No, [illegible]."

"Then we'll have to quarrel, darling."

He yielded, for lack of a better idea: "All right, beloved. How shall we begin?"

On close approach, the idea did seem rather impossible to her. "How could I ever quarrel with you, my love?" she cooed.

He gazed at her with a rush of lovely tenderness: "And how could I ever speak crossly to you?"

"We never shall have a harsh word, shall we?" she resolved.

"Never!" he seconded. So that resolution passed the house unanimously.

They held hands in luxury a while, then she began again: "Still, we must pretend. You start it, love."

"No, you start it," he pleaded.

"You ought to," she beamed. "You got me into this mess."

The word slipped out. Mallory started: "Mess! How is it my fault? Good Lord, are you going to begin chucking it up?"

"Well, you must admit, darling," Marjorie urged, "that you've bungled everything pretty badly."

It was so undeniable that he could only groan: "And I suppose I'll hear of this till my dying day, dearest."

Marjorie had a little temper all her own. So she defended it: "If you are so afraid of my temper, love, perhaps you'd better call it all off before it's too late."

"I didn't say anything about your temper, sweetheart," Mallory insisted.

"You did, too, honey. You said I'd chuck this up till your dying day. As if I had such a disposition! You can stay here." She rose to her feet. He pressed her back with a decisive motion, and demanded: "Where are you going?"

"Up in the baggage car with Snoozleums," she sniffled. "He's the only one that doesn't find fault with me."

Mallory was stung to action by this crisis: "Wait," he said. He leaned out and motioned down the alley. "Porter! Wait a moment, darling. Porter!"

The porter arrived with a half-folded blanket in his hands, and his usual "Yassah!"

Beckoning him closer, Mallory mumbled in a low tone: "Is there an extra berth on this car?"

The porter's eyes seemed to rebuke his ears. "Does you want this upper made up?"

"No—of course not."

"Ex—excuse me, I thought—"

"Don't you dare to think!" Mallory thundered. "Isn't there another lower berth?"

The porter breathed hard, and gave this bridal couple up as a riddle that followed no known rules. He went to find the sleeping car conductor, and returned with the information that the diagram showed nobody assigned to number three.

"Then I'll take number three," said Mallory, poking money at the porter. And still the porter could not understand.

"Now, lemme onderstan' you-all," he stammered. "Does you both move over to numba three, or does yo'—yo' lady remain heah, while jest you preambulates?"

"Just I preambulate, you black hound!" Mallory answered, in a threatening tone. The porter could understand that, at least, and he bristled away with a meek: "Yassah. Numba three is yours, sah."

The troubled features of the baffled porter cleared up as by magic when he arrived at number three, for there he found his tyrant and tormentor, the English invader.

He remembered how indignantly Mr. Wedgewood had refused to show his ticket, how cocksure he was of his number, how he had leased the porter's services as a sort of private nurse, and had paid no advance royalties.

Palace Where Wagner Died.

Apropos of the return from her chateau in Styria of the Duchesse della Grazia to her palace in Venice, a Paris contemporary gives an interesting account of Vendramin, which is not only one of the most beautiful residences on the canal, but it is closely associated with the history of the city of the doges.

It was built in 1441. German princes occupied it at first. Then it passed into the possession of the duke of Mantua, who purchased it for 50,000 ducats of gold. It was the scene of great social events under the Archduke Charles Ferdinand of Austria and his wife, Anne de Medicis, in 1652, and through them the palace has come into the possession of the present owners through marriage. It was here that Richard Wagner died in 1883. The desk at which he wrote "Tristan und Isolde" is carefully preserved. Some years ago a plaque was affixed to the palace showing its connection with the great composer.

STORY DECLINED; AUTHOR ACCEPTED

Editor Proves to Be a Woman and Cupid Does the Rest.

By CLYDE JOHNSON.

Copyright, 1912, by Associated Literary Press.)

Charles Worthington Rankin had arrived at years of discretion without having selected any particular avocation. He was fairly well off, and there was no need to hurry.

Mr. Rankin had sometimes thought of becoming a doctor, but was discouraged when he realized that he might be called out of bed at 1 o'clock in the morning to saw off some man's leg.

The legal profession, mingled more or less with real estate, insurance, politics, promotion trusteeship, receivership and advising corporations how to break the law, offered certain attractions, but Mr. Rankin had seen lawyers perspire when addressing a jury, and he did hate to perspire.

There was painting, but landscape artists, as he had been reliably informed, had to keep the books for some grocery at night to eke out an existence.

If Mr. Rankin should turn to sculpture there were the clay and the stone dust, to soil his cuffs, and even if he brought out a statue of Columbus the daily papers might call it Captain Kidd.

It took Mr. Rankin a long, long time to make up his mind, and then the decision was the result of accident. He dropped in on an assemblage one day that had gathered to honor a young literary man, and when he saw the admiration and heard the adulations bestowed he whispered to himself:

"By George, but I've struck it! Nice easy work and nothing driving about it. All you've got to do is to sit down in your library and think, and then write what you've been thinking about."

Mr. Rankin walked right out of that place and bought him the necessary tools to begin and complete a story that should be a wonder. He did not make the error that so many amateur writers make, of going to or writing to successful authors and asking them how they did it. He didn't care a red cent how they got their plots or worked up their situations. His story would be his own in every particular.

The Third Time to Read It.

And another thing worth recording in Mr. Rankin's favor is the fact that after he had got his plot, laid his situations, named the day and hour, and had his hero in hiding behind a brick pile, he didn't take the two pages of manuscript to this one and that one, and ask them how they thought the story would work out.

No, Sir and no Ma'am! Mr. Rankin didn't care a peanut for the opinions of others, on that particular line of work. Had he been going to open a sandstone quarry for the production and sale of grindstones, it would have been different, but in this he was right at home. He felt it from the very first line he wrote. It was to be a serial for a magazine. When finished, after seven long weeks of work—which of itself was a great surprise to his friends—the story came to an end, and the author read it over with glowing self-satisfaction. Then it was sent off to the magazine he had selected, and Mr. Rankin and divers other persons held their breath and walked around on tip-toes.

Mr. Rankin figured that it would be at least a month before his check came, and the date of the beginning of the serial would be announced. He was out in his figuring. No one can ever get a close line on those magazine editors. That's why authors continue to revel in poverty. On the [illegible] day the story was returned with the [illegible] of the Congressional Record—after it had been read by the stenographer, all the typists, the cashier, the bookkeeper and the office boy—after having been submitted to the X-ray and a chemical analysis, that editor is convinced that it is one of the great stories of the century, but as his two children are down with the measles he must decline with thanks.

Mr. Rankin read this prescription with amazement. Then he read it with anger. The third time he read it he used cuss-words for punctuation marks and then stood up to say:

"The ignoramus! Why, that editor doesn't know enough to edit a sand-pile, and I'll write and tell him so!"

Mr. Rankin carried out his threat. He had an epistle in the mail-box within the hour that was warranted to make the editorial hair curl and kink. The policy of the magazine editor is never to strike back nor make personal explanations. When he has handed a manuscript to the office boy to be returned to the author that is the end of the affair, except in rare instances. This was a rare instance. J. A. Bennett wrote back that the manuscript had been declined because of its length.

Mr. Rankin pointed out the fact that the magazine had printed four longer ones within the year.

J. A. Bennett wrote that the situations were overdrawn and impossible.

Mr. Rankin pointed out the fact that he had his heroine climbing an iceberg as she sat in the saddle of her broncho, and that the fact was neither unnatural nor impossible. The women of the far west were performing the feat every day.

J. A. Bennett wrote that a great deal of profanity had been introduced into the conversations, and every reader must be more or less shocked. He even had his heroine exclaim: "Damn it!"

Mr. Rankin replied that this was the age of profanity. The trusts had set everybody to swearing, and profanity was on the increase, and the only recourse the public had. As for his heroine, she was a strong character to begin with, and in the second place she had found herself lost on the plains just as night and a blizzard and a band of hostile Indians were approaching. Under those circumstances should a heroine exclaim: "O, fudge!"

J. A. Bennett said that so many grammatical errors were found in the story that it would have to be largely overhauled.

Mr. Rankin replied that he was a graduate of Yale, and that if he couldn't demonstrate in public or private that he knew more about grammar in a minute than J. A. B. did in a week he would eat his hat.

J. A. B. then pointed out that the discussion was closed.

Mr. Rankin replied that the other had best look for a job of sawing wood, and that if he ever ran across him he would take great pleasure in punching his head.

A week later J. A. Bennett went to the country on a fortnight's vacation. Mr. Rankin was only a day later in starting. Fate planned that they should both select the same hotel. Fate planned that on the third day after Mr. Rankin's arrival he should go canoeing on the river. He knew his craft and was safe. Some one else went canoeing at the same time that didn't understand the fads and fancies of that make of craft. It was a young woman, and she had only reached the deepest spot for a mile up and down when over went the canoe. Mr. Rankin heard her screams and arrived at the spot in prompt time. She was resting on the bottom but he dove and found her, and she was carried to the hotel to be revived. Some one told him that it was a Miss Bennett, and that's all he knew about her 'till the next day, when she sent for him to express her gratitude.

Miss Bennett was a little draggled yet, but able to praise Mr. Rankin as a great hero. She surely owed her life to him, and she couldn't find words to tell her feelings.

"And by the way," she smiled, "are you any relation to Mr. Charles Worthington Rankin?"

"Why, I am he!"

A terrible pause ensued and then he asked:

"Can you be related to J. A. Bennett?"

"Why, I am she!"

At least half the magazines have women to read and pass on contributions, and they always sign their names to mislead as to sex.

Did Mr. Rankin punch J. A. B.'s head? Oh, no. He began to admire instead, and in three days he knew that he was in love. He had saved her life. Why shouldn't she admire and love in turn? She won't be a story-reader much longer, and he has already decided that as a story writer he is not a success.

Women and the Farm.

It is not so much because the farmer's boys sought the cities as because his daughters refused to stay on the farm that the rural population has dwindled. At least, the council of the National Bankers' association, in session in Westchester last week, came to the conclusion that the greatest drawback to inducing men to undertake farm work lies in the objections of the women folk. A WONDERFUL DISCOVERY.

In this age of research and experiment, all nature is ransacked by the scientist for the comfort and happiness of man. Science has indeed made giant strides in the past century, and among the—by no means least important—discoveries in medicine is that of Therapion, which has been used with great success in French Hospitals and that it is worthy the attention of those who suffer from kidney, bladder, nervous diseases, chronic weaknesses, ulcers, skin eruptions, piles, &c., there is no doubt. In fact it seems evident from the big stir created amongst specialists, that THERAPION is destined to cast into oblivion all those questionable remedies that were formerly the sole reliance of medical men. It is of course impossible to tell sufferers all we should like to tell them in this short article, but those who would like to know more about this remedy that has effected so many—we might almost say, miraculous cures, should send addressed envelope for FREE book to Dr. Le Clerc Med. Co., Haverstock Road, Hampstead, London, Eng. and decide for themselves whether the New French Remedy "THERAPION" No. 1, No. 2 or No. 3 is what they require and have been seeking in vain during a life of misery, suffering, ill health and unhappiness. Therapion is sold by druggists or mail $1.00. Fougera Co., 90 Beekman St., New York.

What He Bought.

A Syracuse business man living in one of the suburbs decided to give up his spacious back yards to the raising of currants as a profitable side issue. So, wishing to absorb all the information he could acquire on the subject of the currant industry, he went down town one Saturday afternoon recently and returned with his arms full of books.

"Well, Teddy," inquired his enthusiastic spouse, as he dumped the volumes on the table, "did you succeed in getting what you wanted?"

"Sure, I did!" he replied, proudly pointing to the books. "I bought a whole year's edition of a standard work on current literature."—Exchange.

Illiteracy in Germany.

According to the latest official reports, only three persons out of 10,000 in Germany are unable to read or write, while the proportion of illiteracy in Great Britain is 150 per 10,000, as against 770 per 10,000 in the United States. These figures are based on a comparison of illiteracy among some of the leading nations which has just been made and issued for free distribution by the United States Bureau of Education.

"Since using Grape-Nuts alone for breakfast I have been free from these troubles, except at times when I have indulged in rich, greasy foods in quantity, then I would be warned by a pain under the left shoulder blade, and unless I heeded the warning the old trouble would come back, but when I finally got to know where these troubles originated I returned to my Grape-Nuts and cream and the pain and disturbance left very quickly.

FOR BETTER FARMING

FARM SCHOOL TEACHERS TELL BANKERS VALUE OF SCIENTIFIC TRAINING.

YIELDS ARE INCREASED.

As Result of Applied Knowledge—Many Noted Speakers to Address Convention at Final Session in St. Paul.

Minneapolis. — Dr. Andrew M. Soule who is president of the Georgia college of agriculture, caused the bankers and educators assembled at the conference of committees on agricultural development and education at the Hotel Radisson to look up when he told them with the aid of fertilizers three bales of cotton, of 500 pounds each had been raised in Georgia where the average, without fertilization, had been 176 pounds, thereby causing a profit of $100 to the acre.

Dr. Soule spoke on "Agriculture in the South." He explained that he was not sufficiently familiar with soil and local conditions in the Northwest to state what the application of fertilizers might do in Minnesota, but he ventured the opinion that scientific applications of fertilizers would be as profitable here as they had been in Georgia. As a result of improve farming methods, Dr. Soule stated that 3,000,000 bales of cotton were produced in Georgia last year, this aggregate being 800,000 bales more than the average of previous years.

Dean Woods of the Minnesota agricultural college tackled the labor problem in an address on "The Co-operation Between the State and the United States Government in Agricultural Extension Work."

"The unscientific unbusinesslike, and unskilled must and do constantly give place to the scientific, businesslike, skilled workman," said Dean Woods. "The great problem before us now in agriculture is the production of these skilled workmen. In agriculture this does not simply mean skilled operatives or factory hands. It means men and women trained in home making, agriculture, rural life affairs, business methods and broad citizenship. This requires the co-operation of many agencies. The work involves research investigation, experimentation, demonstration and education. We have guessed at conditions long enough. We must now make an inventory of the exact conditions existing in each locality and as far as possible on each farm. Soil agricultural and social surveys must be made. The information gathered must be analyzed and put into shape for general use."

Mr. Woods advocated the study of rural health conditions, activity in stamping out epidemics of live stock, and in general, the spread of the extension method of educating the tillers of the soil.

Other speakers at the afternoon session were Professor Raymond Riordan, superintendent of the Interlaken school, Rolling Prairie, Ind., Dean E. D. Sanderson of the college of agriculture of West Virginia; John T. Burns, secretary of the Internation Dry Farming congress, Lethbridge, Alta., and Professor L. D. Harvey of the Stout Institute, Menominee, Wis.

Efficiency, more practical methods of farming, and a return to the days of the "Mulberry tree," formed the slogan of the convention. President Joseph Chapman, Jr., referred to the conference as the "most democratic organization in the United States." "It has no constitution," he said, "no by-laws, no treasury and nothing to be afraid of."

"Round the Mulberry Tree," used to be the popular song when many of us were children," continued Mr. Chapman. "Its first verse was supposed to represent Monday—washing day. Then for Tuesday there were the words: 'This is the day we iron our clothes.' The third verse represented 'baking' day, and so on for the other days of the week. Now all this is changed and instead, the laundry man comes on Monday, the dry cleaner comes the next day, the baker in his turn and so on. We are too busy keeping up with "Lizzie"—referring to the well known novel by Irving Batchelor.

Lightning Hits Parsonage.

Minneapolis.A freakish bolt of lightning played costly pranks on the residence of Rev. George T. Lawton, rector of St. Andrews' church, in the thunder shower, and the rector and his family barely escaped more serious consequences than financial loss. A bolt hit the peak of a high gable on the west side of the house, tore some of the shingles off, set the house on fire, darted across the street, knocked a man down who was standing on the corner, and passed through one open door and out the other in the house on the opposite corner belonging to Samuel E. Hoopes.

Early Reports Favorable.

Mankato.—Reports giving an idea of threshing results are beginning to come in, and are uniformly favorable. N. E. Fuller secured a yield of 30 bushels of winter wheat to the acre from a ten-acre field. R. L. Houk of Good Thunder threshed a 27-acre field of winter wheat and got an average of 26¼ bushels to the acre, in spite of the fact that the field was badly lodged and the berry somewhat shrunken. H. Boeck of Pleasant Mound got 25 bushels of winter wheat to the acre from his farm.

ESCAPED PRISONER CAUGHT

WAS ONE OF THE QUARTET WHO BROKE OUT AT ROCHESTER.

Found in His Home in Winona—During Journey Lived on Berries.

Winona. — Benjamin Sackreiter, who was sent to the asylum at Rochester several months ago after attempting suicide during incarceration in the county jail by eating a quantity of soft soap and who was one of the four men who escaped from the Rochester institution two weeks ago was recaptured at his home in this city.

Backreitersays a plot was carried out at the asylum and the man escaped through a window. Without a hat he wandered through the woods, begging only when forced to do so to prevent starvation and subsisting mainly on the wild berries he picked along the way.

The man is rational at times but is subject to severe spells. Immediately after scaling the hospital wall he headed for the woods and kept under cover during the day, travelling only nights during the entire two weeks. Neighbors recognized him moving about in his former home, which had been temporarily abandoned and notified the police. They found him exhausted and near the point of actual starvation. He was huddled in a closet on the second floor, and near him were a few crusts of bread. The man is a cripple, with only one arm, and he says he made his home his goal in the hope of securing a false arm left behind when taken to Rochester.

MRS. AKELEY GOES HOME

Widow Said to Have Left With Friends' Knowledge.

Los Angeles, California. — That Mrs. Clara Wood Royce Akeley, widow of the late H. C. Akeley of Minneapolis, did not leave Minneapolis surreptitiously, as reported; that her friends and legal adviser knew of her intended departure many days before she left; that she is not traveling incognito through Canada; and when she would arrive to Portland, from which point she would start to San Francisco, spending a few days visiting friends, and then return to her old home in Long Beach, was told by Mrs. O. S. Staples, mother of Mrs. Akeley, when she received a telegram from her daughter.

"Insofar as the charges that she is fleeing to California in order to fight the estate here and attempt to gain half of it here, it is all bosh. She certainly would not adopt any such tactics. The report that a 'strong box' had been shipped to Long Beach is false. If any such shipment was made I would have been notified of it by my daughter and no such notification has been received by me."

APPLE CROP SMALL.

Many Trees in Southeastern Minnesota Killed by Hard Winter.

Winona. — Winona county's apple crop this year is a failure and this condition prevails throughout Southeastern Minnesota. There are thousands of dead apple trees in this section.

C. A. Pfeiffer, a horticultural expert, says there are several reasons for the state of the apple crop this year, and he asserts the big freeze in April, 1910 was the primary cause. The frost killed everything then, and the summer following was long, hot, and dry so that the trees had no chance to recuperate.

Last year to made up for no crop the year before, nature overloaded the trees, causing the record Minnesota apple crop. To bear the load, all the energy of the trees was required, thus lowering their vitality. Last winter many trees died.

The commission is expected to have the charter ready to submit to the people at the general election in November.

Those appointed on the commission are:

DULUTH STRIKE ENDED.

Freight Handlers on N. P. Docks Agree to Compromise.

Duluth. — The strike of the freight handlers on the Northern Pacific docks is ended. At a meeting the men voted to accept the recommendation of the council arbitration committee. The terms of the compromise are 32½ cents an hour for merchandise, 35 cents for cement, no discrimination against the men and pay for time lost in shifting ships.

KILL EACH OTHER

NORMAN HELMER, HERO OF PUPOSKY RAID, KILLED BY FINN LABORER.

WAS A BEMIDJI DEPUTY.

Empties Automatic Gun Into Prisoner. —Both Men Expire Within a Few Feet of One Another.

Bemidji.—Norman Helmar, who was a hero of the battle of Popusky in June a year ago when Martin Bahan was wounded and captured while Mike Davis made his escape, was shot and mortally wounded by a railroad laborer and in turn shot and killed his assassin at Nymore, a mill suburb here.

After having received a bullet through his body near the heart, Helmer turned on the man, who shot from behind, and sent six bullets from his automatic revolver into him and the fellow dropped dead in his tracks.

Helmer had been ordered by Sheriff Hazen to go to Nymore and arrest the man who previously had had a fight with Charles Smith, an Italian section hand.

Helmer's assailant, who was a Finn and whose name is unknown, had been working on an extra railroad gang at Gemmell and came to Bemidji on the morning passenger.

Later the Finn went to the Smith shack and made himself at home. When Smith returned and found the Finn there, a fight ensued in which Smith grabbed an axe and struck the Finn on the head and in the back. The Finn ran down the track with Smith in pursuit and as they were passing the Minnesota and International tower, Alex Dougherty, day towerman, ran out and caught Smith, but the Finn continued down the track.

Dougherty at once telephoned to Sheriff Hazen and that official, with Game Warden Sherman S. Bailey, went to Nymore, arrested Smith and brought him to Bemidji where he was placed in the county jail. Then Sheriff Hazen dispatched Deputies Helmer and James Cahill to go back and get the Finn.

Arriving at Nymore, three small boys told the deputies that the Finn had been shooting at the Smith shack and that he had said he would kill Smith. Cahill said he would go to the shack and investigate. Helmer started down the track and at a point about a quarter of a mile from the tower the Finn was discovered in the brush, carrying a rifle. "Get out of there," called Helmer.

The Finn obeyed the command and Helmer approached and took the rifle and not thinking the man had other arms, turned to walk back down the track, calling to the Finn to follow him. Instead of obeying this order the Finn whipped out a 44 calibre Colt revolver and sent a bullet through Helmer's body at a point just below the shoulders.

"I'm a goner," gasped Helmer, but at the same time he wheeled about and sent six bullets from his automatic revolver into the Finn, who fell at the first shot. The only eye witnesses of the shooting were three small boys, each about 10 years old.

HANGS BY SHOE STRING.

Duluth Laborer Despondent, Crippled and Out of Work.

Duluth. — John Peterson, a laborer, succeeded in hanging himself with a pair of shoe strings in a room where other men were sleeping, and without arousing anybody. His feet were on the floor and the shoe strings were attached to a heavy bracket. Death was due to strangulation. He was without money and unable to work.

Conservationists are Invited.

St. Paul.—Governor Eberhart has just been asked to call a second Conservation and Agricultural Development congress to be held in Minneapolis in conjunction with the Northwest Land Products exposition in November. The Minnesota Federation of Commercial clubs and the Minneapolis Civic and Commerce association have extended an invitation to the governor to call a congress similar to the one held in 1910 in St. Paul.

Rain Halts Harvesting.

Belgrade. — A heavy rain, accompanied by an electrical storm, occurred here, serving to set back harvesting operations. Farmers generally have about all of their grain in the stack. The prevailing opinion here is that the crop will equal if not eclipse the bumper crop of three years ago in this section.

Ties Piled on Railway Track.

Owantonna.—An attempt to wreck an extra freight train on the North-Western railroad was frustrated, when Engineer Drysdale discovered a small pile of ties placed across the track. The train was running on a fast schedule, but the speed had been so lessened before the wheels struck the obstruction that the train was not thrown from the tracks. A gang of hoboes seen near the place are suspected of having made the attempt in the belief that the approaching train was a mail train.

FARM AND BEES

HANDY AS A SWARM CATCHER

Material, Which Costs but Few Cents, Consists of Cloth Bag, and Piece of Wire.

(By F. G. HERMAN.)

I will describe how to make a swarm catcher with which a swarm of bees clustered 30 feet high can be hived nearly as quickly and easily as when near the ground.

It requires only a short time to make one. The material, which is worth but a few cents, consists of a large bag made from any kind of stout, coarse cloth—such a sack as binding-twine comes in is excellent.

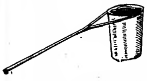
To hold the mouth of this sack open, a piece of smooth wire as large or a little larger than a telegraph-wire is used, which is bent in a circle with the ends overlapping some inches, so that they can be tied together with a small wire or stout cord.

The mouth of the sack is then securely sewed around the wire hoop. A crochet stick, the prongs of which naturally of their own accord stay as far or a little farther apart than the diameter of the wire hoop, is used, and with stout cord the end of each prong is tied to the wire hoop directly opposite each other so that the sack swings free.

Now the mouth of the open sack will always point upward, no matter at what angle the pronged stick may be held. The stick below the prongs should be at least two feet long so the small end of a light pole can be attached to it by allowing the two to overlap a couple of feet, and binding them together with short straps.

Different length poles can be used, as they can be attached or detached in an instant.

When a swarm is clustered on a small limb, the catcher can be raised up around them, then quickly raised up, which jars the limb, so that the whole swarm falls right into the sack.



A Swarm Catcher.

If they are clustered on a large limb the mouth of the sack can be raised up under them and by moving it one side, the bees are brought into the sack, and a swarm can be picked right off the body of a tree, for by letting the mouth of the sack catch on the body of the tree below the bees, then gradually raising it up, the bees will be brushed in.

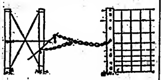
Carry to the hive and invert the bag, or rather turn it inside out, and the bees will drop in front of the hive and run into it, and the hiving is done.

STRETCHER FOR WOVEN WIRE

Excellent Device May Be Made Using Heavy Chains Attached to Two by Four Pieces.

An excellent device for making a stretcher for woven wire is described by Elmer J. Million of Oklahoma in the Farmers Mail and Breeze as follows:

Take two stay chains from the wagon and a log chain, fasten a chain or wire about two feet from a two by four or other pole and connect back to the corner post and you have a good stretcher for woven wire fence.



Wire Stretcher.

Sling a stay chain about the lever on either side of the connecting wire, or chain and hook the other ends into the log chain as the fence is drawn up with the lever. To get a firm hold on the wire take two pieces of two by four and bolt them over the end of the wire as shown.

Fertilizers for Black Gumbo.

In the southwest black gumbo soils are frequently difficult to handle. Of late years they have been planted freely to orchards of various kinds and orange and grape fruits seem to occupy considerable attention. For these two crops, use a mixture of equal parts cottonseed meal and acid phosphorus at the rate of 500 pounds per acre. Apply this in the spring when the trees begin to grow. It may be applied around the trees and worked in, beginning at some little distance from the tree, depending upon the size. For small trees begin at a distance of two feet. For large trees at a distance of about 10 feet. For trees four years old, 50 pounds of kainit can be added to the above mixture. The mixture with the kainit added will be suitable for pears, plums and peaches.

[illegible] of Red Cross Seals.

The campaign for selling Red Cross seals this year will be carried on in practically every state and territory in the United States, and even in Porto Rico, the Canal Zone, Hawaii and Philippine islands. No less than 100,000 volunteer agents, including department, drug and other kinds of stores, motion picture theaters, individuals and others, will be engaged in the work. Before the sale is completed, it is expected that at least 100,000,000 seals will have been printed and distributed, besides several million posters, display cards and other forms of advertising literature.

VON HOYDONCK—MAN

THE TRUE STORY OF A FAMOUS MUTINY

By FRANK MARSHALL WHITE

© BY RIDGWAY CO.

CAPTAIN STANLEY HATFIELD of the bark Lennie looked over the crew that a Thames "crimp" or shipping agent had brought from London to the berth of his ship at the Antwerp wharves, October 24, 1875, and earnestly called upon his Maker to witness that he had never before beheld such a scurvy-looking herd of swine within ten miles of a ship in the thirty years he had been at sea.

"So 'elp me," he declared to the shipping agent, "I bloomin' well might 'ave sent to Lambeth work'us, an' found a likelier lot! Bli' me, if I 'aven't 'arf a mind to ship the 'ole bleedin' gang back w'erever you got 'em from, an' let you an' them go 'ang for your crew!"

Only two of the ten men to whom he had thus feelingly referred understood his remarks literally, for the crew was a racial composite that included four Turks, three Greeks, an Englishman, an Austrian and a Dane.

The master of the Lennie could scarcely be blamed, from a seaman's point of view, for objecting to the nondescript ten as sailors. But the Lennie, which was of a thousand tons burden and owned in Yarmouth, Nova Scotia, had been ready to sail for New Orleans from Antwerp, with a mixed cargo, and, as Captain Hatfield had been unable to obtain a crew in the port where his ship lay, he had been compelled at the last moment to telegraph to the shipping agent in London, who had picked up the ten men for him along Ratcliffe Highway—the riffraff of their calling, small men for the most part, shabby and unkempt.

The first and second mates of the Lennie were Englishmen, respectively Joseph Wortley and Robert McDonald. Captain Hatfield made Green boatswain, Green being, despite the name he gave as his own, a Greek, though able to speak and understand English, and therefore able to act as interpreter for the captain's orders.

There were yet two more nationalities represented on the vessel's roster. The man whose splendid heroism and daring ingenuity in the face of death make the story of the Lennie worth telling was a giant from Belgium, six feet and three inches tall, who was at that time twenty-five years of age, and whose name was Constant Von Hoydonck. He had shipped as steward, although he held a master's certificate in the merchant marine, and he spoke English, French and Dutch. The cabin boy was Dutch, his name being Henri Trousselot, and he had been brought on board by Von Hoydonck, to whose care the lad had been intrusted by his parents.

The Lennie sailed from Antwerp with her polyglottous crew the day after their arrival from London, and her cruise is memorable in the annals of the sea. It is a story that has not been made public since it was related in an English criminal court by the participants in the occurrence thirty-five years ago. Five European governments decorated the hero of the exploit.

That Captain Hatfield, First Mate Wortley and Second Mate McDonald deserved the fate that overtook them five days out from Antwerp there is little doubt, for all three were cruel and brutal taskmasters, whose method of getting the most work out of the men under them was by means of curses and blows.

Whether the sailors had previously formed a conspiracy for the murder of the Lennie's officers or whether they turned on them simultaneously on being driven to desperation is a question that was afterward considered by an English jury. The tragedy occurred early on the morning of October 31, the Lennie being then off the island of Oleron in the Bay of Biscay. In First Mate Wortley's watch, from midnight until four o'clock, were Boatswain Green, Cargalis, Caludis, Kaids, Ranken and Petersen. At three-thirty, Wortley gave the order to put the ship about, and, as a fresh breeze was blowing, all hands were ordered to the work. Ranken, the Englishman, was at the wheel, and, while the others were at the main braces, Captain Hatfield came on deck and fell upon them with kicks and cuffs.

"Git to work, ye —— —— ——!" he roared.

Cargalis suddenly drew a big clasp-knife from his pocket, opened it and sprang upon the captain, driving the point of the weapon into his stomach. In the fraction of a second Caludis, the Turk known as "Big Harry," had followed the example of the Greek, stabbing Hatfield in the forehead and side and then seizing him about the waist and bearing him to the deck, where he proceeded to pull off the prostrate man's boots, preparatory to throwing him overboard, while two others of the crew hacked at their late taskmaster with knives.

All these things had occurred in much less time than it takes to describe them, and it was not until the captain—who had had no weapon with him, even if he had been given the chance to use it—had been stretched on the deck that the first mate realized what was occurring. He, too, was unarmed, but he sprang to the side of Hatfield, who was still alive, and attempted to drag him toward the saloon. In a flash, Cascaris drove his knife into Wortley's heart, twice repeating the thrust, and the second victim fell dead across the body of the first.

Roused by the noise of the struggle on the deck, Second Mate McDonald at this moment rushed from his cabin. Seeing the bleeding bodies of his two superior officers and the ferocious countenances and streaming knives of the crew, he ran to Boatswain Green, the only one of them to whom he could speak English, and putting his arms around his neck begged him to save his life. The Greek responded with a thrust of his knife into the other's bowels.

The sounds of the struggle on the deck over his head had wakened Von Hoydonck, who had been asleep in his bunk. He had heard the pistol-shots without realizing what they meant; then the cabin-boy, who had also been roused by the commotion and had ventured to peep over the top of the companionway to the deck, rushed in frenziedly to inform him that the ship's officers were being murdered by the crew. The young giant bounded out of his bunk and, without waiting to put on clothes or boots, seized a heavy cane, the only weapon at hand, and made for the deck.

As he reached the head of the companionway the mutineers saw him and swung the door to, half a dozen of them putting their combined weight against it.

Imprisoned with the cabin-boy in what had been the officers' quarters, for the single companionway and the skylight were the only means of egress, Von Hoydonck dressed himself and made a rapid search for weapons. He was fortunate enough to find two revolvers and a box of cartridges in the captain's stateroom, and these he put into his pockets. Then he considered the situation. If, as was doubtless the case, the captain and the first and second mates had been killed, there was no one on board capable of navigating the ship save himself, for he had observed that the ten members of the crew scarcely knew one sail of the Lennie from the other. He knew the men were aware that he was a qualified navigator, for he had laid out the ship's course for Captain Hatfield the second day out.

While Von Hoydonck was speculating on these matters the skylight over the saloon was pried up a few inches, and Green, the boatswain, called to him. "We want to have a talk with you," he said. "We ain't going to hurt you. We've got a proposition to make."

Considering that he might as well bring things to a crisis first as last, the Belgian responded, bidding Green come down to the saloon. Von Hoydonck ensconced himself behind the table, with one revolver in his hand, and posted Henri on a chair in the corner with the other, which he bade him keep pointed at the door. When Green, followed by the others, with Cargalis, Kalda and Cascaris close at his back, appeared at the portal, they were confronted by the two weapons, the one in the corner waving tremulously, and the other steady in the hand of the big Belgian.

"Only one of you inside the door!" said Von Hoydonck calmly. "Come in, Green, and let me know what you've got to say, quick! Tell the others to keep back!"

Giving the order to his fellows, who were quite willing to get out of range of the two pistols—seeming, indeed, to fear the one that was wavering with the boy's nerveless finger on the trigger rather than the other, the boatswain stepped up to the table, his swarthy features twisted into what was intended to be an ingratiating grin, and said: "We don't intend to do you any harm. We've finished with the others."

"What do you mean?"

"We've finished with the captain and the first and second mates, and thrown their bodies overboard," Green explained.

"What do you want of me?"

"We want you to join us," said the Greek. "There's a fortune here for all of us."

He proceeded to explain that Cargalis was his cousin and that they had an uncle in Greece who was a dealer in nautical goods and incidentally a "fence" for stolen ships, who would buy the Lennie and her cargo for cash if they should deliver her off Zacynthus, an island near the cost in the Ionian sea. If Von Hoydonck would navigate the ship to the point described, Green told him, he would be permitted to share and share alike with the ten members of the crew in the proceeds of the sale of vessel and cargo.

While the boatswain was speaking an idea flashed across Von Hoydonck's mind—to seem to agree to the proposition to sail the Lennie to Greece, but, relying on the ignorance of the crew, actually to navigate her to England in the opposite direction, turn her over to her owners and bring the mutineers to justice.

Wherefore Von Hoydonck, professing immense relief that he was not included among the enemies of the crew and great joy at the prospect of an immediate fortune, eagerly assented to the scheme outlined by the boatswain, that worthy translating him to the non-English-speaking rascals, who crowded into the saloon to make protestations of friendship.

The Belgian had meantime taken the second pistol from Henri, and ostentatiously put both weapons into his own coat pockets. A moment later a scream from the boy caused the giant to turn hurriedly and see Henri in the grasp of Kaida, who was dragging him toward the companionway. Springing after them, Von Hoydonck struck the Turk a blow in the jaw from behind that rendered him unconscious for ten minutes, threw the boy into a corner of the room and stood at bay before him with the two revolvers drawn, one in each hand. "Tell the men that I'll kill the next one that lays a hand on this boy!" he roared to Green.

"I'm master of this ship until we get to Greece!" he bellowed, for the sake of the effect of his stentorian voice rather than from rage.

When the sun was high enough for the taking of observations, Von Hoydonck went on deck with the sextant.

The navigator found the Lennie to be about one hundred and fifty miles south of Falmouth, in approximately forty-six degrees north latitude and eight degrees west longitude. During the period of excitement over the murder of the ship's officers and the conference with the steward the wheel had been lashed or left unattended, and the vessel had moved out of her course so that she pointed almost due west. Showing Green the correct position of the Lennie on the captain's chart, Von Hoydonck explained the necessity of changing the southwest course she had previously pursued for New Orleans, to a southerly one for Gibraltar, en route for the Ionian sea via the Mediterranean.

In putting the ship about, however, he gave orders that reversed the direction, without creating suspicion in the mind of the ignorant Greek.

For four days the Lennie sailed northward, and each day the Belgian took his observations, marking the chart to show the mutineers how far she had traveled south, while he carried the actual reckoning as nearly as possible in his head.

Carrying his reckonings in his head, Von Hoydonck miscalculated their arrival off the English shore, coming within sight of land just as it was growing dark on the evening of November 3. As the land appeared off the starboard bow, he had no difficulty in making the crew believe that it was the coast of Morocco they saw, explaining that, owing to inaccuracies in his calculations, the ship had run past Gibraltar. The Lennie was at once put about, and, giving up the idea of obtaining succor from England, Von Hoydonck sailed the ship into the Bay of Brest on the north coast of France, which his dupes naturally took to be Spain.

Arriving the following evening, he told them that they were off Cadiz; and, as the weather happened to be stormy, suggested that they anchor over night, particularly as it would be necessary to take new observations of the sun before laying out the ship's course through the Mediterranean.

The mutineers assented to the dropping of the anchor, and before daybreak Von Hoydonck had not only contrived surreptitiously to throw over the Lennie's side twenty-four bottles, each containing one of the messages, in French and English, revealing conditions on board the ship and asking for assistance, but had managed to run up a distress signal where it might be observed in the morning should another vessel come close enough before the crew discovered it.

It so happened that the first of his bottles was not found for two days—on the Brittany coast ten miles from the point where it was thrown overboard.

It was still stormy when day broke the next morning, and Von Hoydonck, peering from the porthole of his steward's cabin, saw that there was considerable shipping about them. The crew had discovered the flag of distress almost immediately, however, and at once brought it down, but not until it had been descried by a passing tug-boat. The tug at once came alongside, but could not get close enough for any communication other than by signal. The mutineers were clever enough to explain, in response to the tug's signals, that their distress was due to the fact that their chronometer had run down, whereupon the other boat signaled them the time and went its way.

Had Von Hoydonck then been aware that the crew had no ammunition for the pistols he knew to be in their possession, he would have given them battle while they were signaling, in the hope that the men on the tug would have taken cognizance of it.

While Von Hoydonck had been plotting against the mutineers, they, too, had been plotting. Believing themselves to be at Cadiz, it had occurred to them that it would be possible to navigate the Lennie through the Strait of Gibraltar and the Mediterranean, keeping within sight of the shore and hence obviating the necessity of taking the sun and making calculations therefrom. Hence they had decided to murder their navigator (and incidentally the cabin-boy) in the morning and get along without him. Had Von Hoydonck, therefore, not anticipated trouble because of having run up the distress flag and been led to take precautions in leaving his cabin, he would doubtless have been killed then.

The mutineers set sail and started for Gibraltar that morning, posting a continual lookout at the door of the steward's cabin. Much to their surprise, however, after sailing for three days southward along the coast, no Rock of Gibraltar hove in sight. According to the admiralty chart on board it should have been only a day's run from Cadiz. On the third night, moreover, a storm drove them out of sight of land, and the next day they were compelled to make overtures to Von Hoydonck.

Being in a position to dictate to the mutineers, the Belgian demanded that their two pistols, which he knew to be the only ones on board with the exception of the two he carried, be handed in to him before he left his cabin. It was when this condition was complied with that he learned to his chagrin that the ammunition for the weapons had given out with the shooting of McDonald eight days before, and that he might have thrown down the gauntlet to the desperadoes when they were in the Bay of Brest.

By a remarkable coincidence the Lennie was found to be approximately in the same position when Von Hoydonck made his observations that morning as she had been when he assumed the duties of navigator on the day her officers were murdered. He refused to answer any of Green's questions as to their whereabouts, however.

Von Hoydonck sailed the Lennie for the Pointe de L'Aiguille in the province of Vendee, bringing her to anchor about five miles from shore on the evening of the ninth of the month, for he was sure that some of his messages would have been picked up by that time and that search would have been instituted for the mutiny ship. That night Cargalis, Cascaris, Kaids, Caludis, Angelos and Green took Captain Hatfield's property and the ship's papers and went ashore in one of the ship's boats at Sables d'Olonne, where they claimed to be shipwrecked sailors, all unaware that the bottle found farther up the coast had made the news of the mutiny known all along the west of France. The six sailors were at once recognized as members of the murderous crew, and were arrested and put in irons.

Meanwhile Von Hoydonck, with the Englishman, the Dane, the Austrian and a Turk for his crew, had navigated the ship to the vicinity of La Flotte, off the Isle de Re. Here on the following morning, the 10th of November, the French man-of-war Travailleur, that had got track of her through the landing of the six mutineers at Sables d'Olonne, overtook the Lennie, and the brave Belgian's long vigil was over.

Newspaper reporting was not as highly developed a vocation in Europe in the seventies of the last century as it is today, and it was not until the trial of the ten mutineers in England the following May that Von Hoydonck's fame became international.

SAVED FROM RUIN

Undermining of Winchester Cathedral Stopped by Cement.

For Many Years the Historic Building Has Been Cracking, Bulging and Settling, Threatening to Collapse Completely.

London.—After a period of eight centuries, Winchester cathedral now rests on a solid and immovable foundation, saved from threatened ruin. Almost every day in the last few years the movements of a diver in regulation dress have been watched with curious interest as he entered or emerged from the water beneath the foundations of the cathedral. He was at work helping to save from ruin one of England's noblest historic buildings, and the successful issue of the undertaking has been celebrated by a thanksgiving service in the cathedral.

For several years the dean and chapter of Winchester had been watching ominous signs, such as cracks, bulgings and settlements, sure harbingers of a collapse of the cathedral. From the interior daylight could be seen through the cracks; the latter grew ever wider and wider. The walls on the south side and the Norman transepts, unequaled for their majestic simplicity, were riven in all directions.

The massive masonry of the Norman builders had from the beginning proved too ponderous for the watery, compressible soil which forms the foundation.

The first hole dug into the foundations revealed the cause of the whole trouble—water—and acting on expert advice, holes were dug in sections through the top soil and chalk and far through the peat. Then it was the work of the diver in his usual diving dress to enter the hole, remove further layers of peat so as to allow the water to rise into the cavity, and then to lay a flooring of cement to prevent the water from sinking back into the gravel. After the imprisoned water had been removed by pumping the cavity was filled up with brickwork in cement. This extended from the floor laid by the diver up to the solid stonework of the cathedral, showing like a roof of rock overhead.

East Front of Winchester Cathedral.

While the work underground was being carried on, patiently and thoroughly, seven anxious years, the cracks in the walls, vaultings and arches of the fabric were welded by the injection of liquid Portland cement from a squirting machine, a process known as grouting, capable of being so manipulated as to fill either a shallow crack or a rent through the thickness of a massive wall.

Every crevice is now being repaired, every flaw and displacement remedied, every trace of instability in the foundations removed, and the cathedral seems to stand as solidly as the strongest building in the kingdom.

MAN'S SIGHT IS RESTORED

Fall Against Door Gives George Morgan Hope for Complete Recovery.

Wilmington, Del.—Becoming totally blind fourteen weeks ago, George M. Morgan Jr., aged twenty-three years, 1351 East Thirteenth street, had his sight restored to him through an accident. About eleven years ago Morgan was struck in one eye with a stone a small boy had thrown at a freight car. His sight was badly affected and last September he went to St. Joseph's hospital in Baltimore to have his eye treated. While sitting in his boarding house fourteen weeks ago he suddenly became totally blind without any warning whatever.

He came to this city to visit his parents on June 29, and he tripped over a rug and fell, his forehead striking a door-jamb with much force. When he arose he found that he could see the daylight and later developments showed that he could see better than before he went to the hospital last yar.

He intends to return to the hospital to continue the treatment, although the physicians told him they did not think he ever would be able to see again. His mother was at market at the time of the accident and could not believe her son's glad declaration when she returned until he told her the color of her hat and dress and described other things in the room.

Champion Rifle Shot Lets Holdup Man Rob Him

INDIANAPOLIS, IND.—What would you do if you were the best rifle and revolver shot in the state and a holdup man grabbed your "roll" out of your hands?

Shoot him, of course.

Well, that's just what the champion shot of Indiana didn't do the only time he ever had occasion to rely on his marksmanship to save his property.

John E. Hafner, who won the state championship in the second annual tournament of the Indiana State Rifle association in the Indianapolis battalion armory, for several years has been one of the best shots in the country.

When he was robbed in his place of business a few years ago, it wasn't because he had lost his skill or his nerve, but it was because he obeyed his mother. Hafner was in business on Washington street near Rural street when he was the victim of a "holdup." A customer in Hafner's poolroom gave him a $10 bill in paying for his games, and Hafner took a wallet, containing $175, out of his pocket to get two fives. Two strangers were standing near by and the larger one grabbed the wallet.

At that moment Hafner's mother and one of his employes stepped in at the back door and as Hafner tried to detain the robbers the employe ran into a back room and got Hafner's revolver. He gave Hafner the revolver just as the robbers went out of the door, with Hafner in pursuit. As Hafner leveled the pistol his mother cried "John!" Hafner says he has heard that cry before, and he never in his life disobeyed his mother, so when she told him not to shoot he lowered the pistol and watched the robbers run away with his $175.

"I am not sorry I obeyed my mother," said Hafner when the incident was recalled. "The loss of a few dollars is nothing when compared with the life of a man, even a robber. I did not take up rifle and revolver shooting because of any desire to shed the blood of man or beast."

Mocking Smile of a Girl "Decoy" Is Fatal Lure

LOS ANGELES, Cal.—A winsome lass, flashing a smile as sunnily sweet as a day in June, has brought about the downfall of dozens of auto speeders on the Venice road, the "speed mania" road of Los Angeles county.

On the rear seat of a motorcycle, with a sturdy county motorcycle "cop" steering, the young woman, claim the autoists, has been the pretty decoy that has led them into opening the mufflers of their engines and cutting down the road at a pace that soon landed them in trouble.

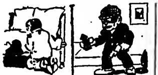
Of course, the motorists do not for a moment think that the pretty young woman on the motorcycle is either the wife or sweetheart of one of their hereditary foes. Far from it. When the motorcycle puffs saucily behind an autoist and starts to pass, with the girl on the rear seat showing a row of pearls in a derisive smile, his pride is touched.

No man with an auto that can cough along at a speed of more than twenty-five miles an hour wants to see his machine passed. Furthermore, he has a sort of brainstorm caused by the tantalizing smile of the pretty young woman, and so he is led to his undoing.

So far, it is estimated, about 100 autoists have fallen into the nicely-baited trap. The motorcycle policemen deny that they are carrying their girls or sweethearts along as "motor bait."

H. Drew of the district attorney's office, who has charge of the eight motorcycle policemen who hunt speeders for the county, said the other day that if the motorcycle policemen carried fascinating young women on the tandem seats of their machines, they were using the feminine decoys on their own initiative. He said that the women never appear in court.

Jersey Lad Prayed at Night and Robbed by Day



PATERSON, N. J.—Kneeling every night to repeat the Lord's Prayer, as it was "drummed" into him by his father, and committing burglary during the day, sixteen-year-old Albert Vreeland has discovered that he has been placed in the front rank of dual personalities. He pleaded guilty in court to seven of a wholesale list of robberies charged against him, and was sent to jail for a term not to be less than 9 or exceed 63 years.

"The champion bad boy of New Jersey" is the title which young Vreeland earned, and every householder in this city who has been the victim of the young burglar and his band, believes he came by it honestly. Apparently he robbed for the pure love of the game.

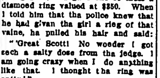
Mrs. Vreeland, the boy's mother, blames the father for a considerable part of the lad's trouble. "My husband," she said, "who has been helpless for the last 11 years because of illness, was entirely too strict with the boy. He is a rigid church member, and I think that Herbert's mischief has been mostly due to his father's attitude toward him. I also think that bad girls influence him.

"He had won the hearts of several young girls, and gave one of them a diamond ring valued at $350. When I told him that the police knew that he had given the girl a ring of that value, he pulled his hair and said:

"'Great Scott! No wonder I got such a salty dose from the judge. I am going crazy when I do anything like that. I thought the ring was pretty.'"

After being sentenced young Vreeland said to his folks: "Well, I'll be 79 when I get out, and the first thing I will do will be to kill two detectives."

Sings Her Favorite Ragtime Ditties at A. M.



CHICAGO.—It was 2 o'clock in the morning, yet the piano in the flat upstairs was still dispensing ragtime. "Come on along, come on along," it insisted, "to Alexander's Rag Time Band," for "everybody's doing it now."

The piano was not the only sleep-destroyer, a human voice was its accomplice—the voice of Mrs. Rose Kilhane, 2951 South Union avenue.

"Ye gods," soliloquized Mrs. Mary Lee, holding her hands to her ears, "how much longer will that music box stand it?"

"O Moving Man, don't take my baby grand," came the voice of the singer.

A fervent prayer escaped from the flat below, a prayer that the moving man would get busy right away. A score of residents in the block would gladly have paid the expenses of the trip when "I want to be, I want to be, I want to be down South in Dixie" floated through the open windows a few moments later.

"O, Mr. Dreamman, please let me dream some more," was the next selection, followed by a ragtime lullaby.

"Hear her," almost sobbed Mrs. Lee, "Singing 'Sleep, Baby, Sleep,' and she won't let anybody else do it."

She hastened out, and searching the streets and alleys finally found a policeman and had him accompany her to the flat.

"Come, hero mine," sang the voice, and the policeman entered. There was no more singing that night, and next day Mrs. Kilhane had a hearing before Municipal Judge Beitler at the South Clark street station. The judge fined her $10 and costs.

That's why the nights are so quiet now in the vicinity of 2951 South Union avenue.

In the PUBLIC EYE

BHAVSINHJI, MAHARAJAH OF BHAVNAGAR

The publication of the history of the Rajkumar college of Kathiawar in western India has drawn into prominent notice the movement for the education of the chiefs and princes of India which was commenced half-a-century ago on the model of the English public schools. The work, which has been sumptuously got up, gives a complete record of the growth of the movement up to date and serves as a book of reference both with regard to the daily work carried on in that seminary and the two generation of youths who have passed through its portals. In this way it amply testifies to the success which has been achieved by the institution since its foundation, of which many of the reigning chiefs of western India themselves furnish living examples.

As a rule the present generation of these princes may be regarded as a notable improvement upon their predecessors of half-a-century back, for although it may not be possible by the methods of western education to inculcate in them a higher degree of the ordinary courtesies of life which are inherent in the oriental of the noble type they are doubtless better fitted than their forefathers were to realize and discharge the obligations that lie upon them as responsible administrators. As leaders of society in their own territories some of them have set noble examples in the way of social and educational reforms by breaking through old customs and superstitions which have cramped the lives of their women for centuries.

The compiler of the history himself has been one of them, and the bestowal of the coveted distinction of the crown of India on the Maharanee of Bhavnagar by his majesty at the Imperial Durbar was a fitting recognition of her husband's efforts to elevate the status of Indian women. Besides being a successful administrator the Maharaja Bhavsinhji is fond of literary pursuits as the history of his alma mater testifies, and he deserves to be congratulated on the many-sided proofs he has been giving of the benefit he derived from his training there. He is, moreover, a keen lover of music, a fearless rider, and an excellent shot.

PRINCE KATSURA OF JAPAN VISITS CZAR

The present visit to Russia of the Japanese statesman, Prince Katsura, is a momentous development toward completing the final details of the defensive alliance pact between Russia and Japan.

The actual agreement between the former enemies was concluded some time ago and probably will be signed soon.

The agreement consists of two parts, one dealing with the delimitation of the spheres of influence of Russia and Japan in Mongolia and Manchuria, which is similar in scope and character to the Anglo-Russian accord of August 31, 1907, regarding Persia. The second part deals with the duty of the two nations for a joint defense in case either power is attacked.

The Russo-Japanese agreement of July 4, 1910, providing for the maintenance jointly of the status quo in Manchuria, was a direct result of the ill-fated neutralization scheme for the Manchurian railroads, and the present one was the outcome of a long entanglement which taught both nations the necessity for a close union of forces.

London advices assert that the new agreement is an exemplification of the treaty of Portsmouth between Russia and Japan. It is said that some of the articles will be expunged and restated in a form confirming to Japan her Liao-Tung peninsular lease, allowing both signatories greater military freedom in Manchurian development and sanctioning the building of a new strategic railway.

The opinion prevails that Japan will have confirmed all of her territory south of the parallel 44, east of longitude 116, giving her paramount influence over and enabling her to dominate Peking, while Russia will have complete liberty of action in all of the Chinese territory outside the great wall and west of the Japanese zone.

Also that Japan formally accepts the Russian twelve-mile limit in territorial waters and supports the construction by Russia of the Kiakhta railway in Siberia.

Novel Boudoir Clock.

Among curious clock novelties is the shadow boudoir clock. With it there is no need of getting up to strike a light or turn on the bulb. All that is necessary is to touch a button and the time is flashed on the wall, after the same fashion that signs are flashed on the sidewalk. When the owner of the clock retires he turns a night dial to the ceiling and when he presses a bulb the electric light reflects from the dial through the lens and appears, giving the correct time in shadow on the ceiling.

WASHINGTON GOSSIP

Colored Brethren Stirred Up Over Question of Hell

HELL IS SO HOT DAT IRON WILL MELT OOH

WASHINGTON.—The colored brethren and sisters in the District of Columbia and the city of Washington are stirred up to a boiling point over the question of hell. The pastors of the various and sundry colored churches held a meeting the other day and in solemn conclave decided that there must be something "didding" immediately to offset the effect of the recent action of the International Bible Students' association in going on record as believing there was no burning hell.

If you take the fireworks out of hell according to some of the colored dispensers of "de gospil" in this city, you rob them of a great lever and a club over their uncertain congregations.

The best way to keep a "nigger" in line is to convince him there is a hell and the hotter you make it and the more awful you can depict his future punishment unless he walks the "strait and narrow" the more apt he is to heed your injunctions, according to the leaders of the various flocks in the District.

A regular honest-to-goodness-burning lake of brimstone and molten lead is the old fashioned kind of hell that has done yeomen service in making young negroes see the error of their ways in the past and has helped mightily the limited donations to foreign missions and the colored pastors here beg to enter a protest against its abolishment.

Others may discard the old time honored hell, but as for the aforesaid pastors they propose to hold right on to it. They reaffirm their undivided belief in the hell of the fathers; the same old hell that they have taught their flocks of, and that is so hot, that if a colored brother gets in ten thousand miles of it he will smell like a wet dog on a hot stove.

Some of the younger members of the various congregations were inclined to harken unto the superior judgment of the Bible Students' association, and were a little inclined to turn a willing ear to the cooling news. So gratifying was the intelligence to them that they were getting real cheerful, and there was some talk of holding a regular jollification over the event, in which everybody would be invited to 'cut loose and have a good time" and when doubtless many respectable persons would have got all "lit up" in honor of the occasion.

The pastors held their meeting, however, and decided to put a crimp in all this wild joy. On the following Sunday, therefore, at the sundry churches all over the city, the colored brother who has been congratulating himself that he could, when he got ready, lay depredating hands upon any unprotected chicken roost without fear of having at some vague time in the future to wrap his system around a few gallons of molten lava while splashing around in a lake of burning brimstone, got a rude jar that upset his calculations.

Perspiring Statesmen Labor At the Capitol.

DID you ever attend a Decoration day celebration and see the local politicians rise up on the platform and deliver themselves of long and fervid oratory? Did you ever notice that they are always dressed in the dignified and sober Prince Albert coat? No matter how hot the day none of them would ever think of rising to speak unless they were attired in this emblem of American statesmanship.

After the local dignitaries had their say and the chairman rose to introduce the most important of them all, the representative in congress from the district or one of the United States senators, were you not impressed by his distinguished appearance? Could you imagine him going about in shirt sleeves, with vest unbuttoned and a handkerchief tied about his neck? No! A thousand times No! You could not. But they do.

It's warm in Washington in the summertime. Some people say it's hot and some more people say some other things about it. Take a walk some summer day across one of the wide stretches of asphalt that surrounds the U. S. capitol and see the heat radiate from the pavement. It seems almost to scorch your shoes.

One day the papers print an interview with some one of the leaders that congress will adjourn early in August. The story arouses hope in many hearts. A few days after they print another interview with some other man just as prominent who says that there will be no adjournment until the middle of September. So it goes. Meanwhile it is hard to get together a quorum of the faithful to transact business. The other day when an important bill was up before the house there were not enough members present and the sergeant at arms was instructed to go out and arrest any members that he could find and bring them in. They were rounded up from their offices and from the long cool corridors and cloak-rooms of the capitol where they were basking in the breezes from electric fans or in the solitude of their offices where they had discarded their coats and were endeavoring to keep cool.

"What is holding up the adjournment?" was asked a representative. "It's that darn lazy senate," said he, "and a lot of men who take up the time of the sessions with long political speeches that hold up the business that ought to have precedence." The house could adjourn in three days," he continued, "but they will have to wait for the bills now before the senate to pass that body and come to them for ratification."

There are only two or three important bills up before congress that must be settled before the members can go home. In the meantime the statesmen will continue to swelter.

Most of them would be glad of the opportunity to get home and attend to the work of fixing their political fences for their re-election this fall. Some of them feel, perhaps, that they can't be re-elected and want to stay in office as long as possible. At any rate they must continue to stay at the capitol and swelter until the close of the session.

Practical Joke Causes Break Between Senators

NO
SENATOR COKE, OF MASSACHUSETTS I BELIEVE?

"THE late Senator Coke of Texas and Private John Allen of Mississippi were warm personal friends and for years dined at the same table at the old Metropolitan hotel," said Col. Charles A. Edwards, the noted correspondent, the other day.

"The propensity of Private John to work off a joke even on as dignified a statesman as was Richard Coke came very near creating a permanent break in their amicable relations. I may say here that the Texan was an intense southerner, naturally of an irascible temperament.

"Well, to get back to my story as to the trick played him by the gentleman from Tupelo. It all came about through the action of John Allen in allowing his beard to grow out during a vacation of congress. Throughout the session he had gone clean-shaved, so that on his reappearance the following winter with a full beard not even the negro bellboys at his hotel knew him, and he had to introduce himself to the proprietor.

"The only other person to whom the jocose legislator disclosed himself was Senator Berry of Arkansas, and the latter, at Allen's request, took him into the presence of Coke and introduced the humorist as Mr. Beeman, a newly elected member from Mississippi.

"'Very glad, Mr. Beeman, to meet you,' said Senator Coke, rising and extending his hand with great suavity. Shaking the proffered hand, the impostor drawled out: 'Very glad also to meet you, senator. Senator Coke of Massachusetts, I believe?'

"'No, sir; not from Massachusetts by a d—— sight,' answered the hot-tempered Texan, snorting."

QUEER SCHOOLS.

There is in St. Petersburg an institution where young men are trained for service as police. The course of instruction provided is supplemental to the examination given by municipal authorities, says the New York Herald. Special study is given by pupils to the tools of various kinds employed by professional thieves. There is a class devoted solely to the study of forgery, with particular reference to the falsifying of signatures and vises on passports, a most important consideration in the performance of the duties of a Russian policeman. A school for croupiers is conducted at Monte Carlo. During the summer months, in the clubroom of the Tir aux Pigeons and the Salle de'Escrime, in the Casino building, aspirants for the office of croupier learn the operation of gambling tables. Each pupil must from time to time, while others are impersonating players and making their respective wagers, conduct the game and learn how instantly to calculate and to pay out the winning stakes. Generally, it is said, there are about 60 or 70 pupils in this school, and a six months' course is deemed sufficient to turn out finished croupiers. Brussels has a school for the instruction of gravediggers. This gruesome institution was founded by the directors of the Evere cemetery. All candidates for appointment as sextons throughout Belgium must pass an examination at this school before they can obtain employment as gravediggers.

What is a jay walker? We all know him and recognize him as a pest, but Kansas City was first in giving him a name and separate classification. The jay walker is the person who walks or loiters in crowded streets, totally indifferent to the rights and convenience of those he comes in contact with there. In crossing from one sidewalk to another he ignores the cross-walks and meanders among wagons, traction cars and automobiles with a recklessness that puts the drivers in danger of heart failure. On a crowded sidewalk he keeps to the left instead of to the right, roughly shouldering his way through the oncoming stream of humanity. He stops to talk with acquaintances on busy corners, planting himself where he will most interfere with the progress of the people passing by. On the narrow boardwalk in front of an excavation for a new building he leisurely surveys the operations going on behind the fence, compelling all who wish to pass to step off upon the dirty pavement.

There has started in Baltimore a systematic plan to deal with street mendicants in a practical and sensible way, says the Baltimore American. As a result of a conference a special mendicancy officer has been appointed to make a careful examination of each case and suggest the wisest method of dealing with it. He will have plenty to do, although street beggars are not as numerous as they were a few years ago. Still there are an abundance of them, surely enough to keep an officer busy. Some of these mendicants have grown old in the business and are familiar figures on busy shopping streets. Few, if any, of them, are worthy of charity. They stay in the business because they find it the easiest way to get food and drink, especially drink.

One portion of the British Isles is not likely to take much interest in the bill for reforming the calendar which is to be introduced into parliament, says the London Globe. The act enforcing the Gregorian calendar was passed 161 years ago, but it is still ignored in Shetland. Almost all through the group of islands the old style of reckoning time is still followed. What we call January 13 is New Year's day among the Shetlanders and celebrated by them with all manner of old observances, including the solemn drinking of the national toast—"Health to man and death to the gray fish."

DRAMATIC APPEAL TO JURY

Declares He Has Given Almost His Life Blood to Save McNamara Brothers—Makes Bitter Attack on John Harrington.

Los Angeles, Cal., Aug. 17.—Before District Attorney Fredericks took up his final attack upon Clarence S. Darrow on Thursday the noted Chicago labor lawyer, vehemently declared his innocence of the charge of attempting to bribe jurors in the McNamara case.

Darrow's plea for his own liberty and name was the most dramatic spectacle of all the dramatic incidents that have marked his trial, of several months. More than 2,000 persons crowded the courtroom and corridors to hear the accused man appeal to the jury in his own behalf.

Dramatic and pathetic was Darrow's reply to the allegation contained in the argument of District Attorney Ford that the McNamara counsel had betrayed his client. His voice grew husky and tears rolled down his cheeks as he said: "I betray my clients. I who had given almost my life blood to save those boys; I who suffered and had the criticism of a nation and of my friends heaped upon my head to save the lives of my clients! Gentlemen, I did what I could, what I thought was best; if you think I betrayed my clients, very well, I drink the cup to the dregs. I wanted to save those boys, and did it as honestly, and with as much a sacrifice as I ever did an act in my life." He told of the closing days of the McNamara case, of how he had come to realize that his case was hopeless and of how he groped about to try to arrive at what was best to be done. "'I said I had no right to consider myself. I had no right to consider the men who gave me the money, I realized that the lives of two men depended upon what I would do."

Turning to the testimony of John Harrington, the Chicago attorney connected with the McNamara defense, who testified for the state, Darrow shouted, "Do I have to consider such a man—a man posing as my friend who had eaten at my table, and had slept in my bed, and all the time seeking to destroy me?" He compared Harrington to a steer used in the Chicago stock yards to lead the cattle up the chute to their destruction.

"I suppose he would be eating with me now," he said, "if I gave him a chance and all the time having a dagger in his pocket when he got through eating."

WILLIAM BRUCE M'MASTER SLAIN AT CARTAGENA, COLOMBIA.

Secretary of State Knox Has Given Instructions for a Most Rigid Investigation of Affair.

Washington, Aug. 16.—Secretary of State Knox instructed the consuls at Bogota and Cartagena, Colombia, to make a rigid investigation into the killing of William Bruce MacMaster, formerly United States vice and deputy consul at Cartagena, while hunting.

MacMaster's body was found with several bullet holes in the back and it is supposed he was killed by native enemies who had made several attempts on his life within the past five years. The vice-consul was an American born in Colombia, and had extensive cattle and ranch interests there. Through trouble with his employes he was unpopular and was forced to kill a man in a quarrel two years ago. He was acquitted but had been fearful of violence ever since.

LECTURES IN VETO

PRESIDENT REFUSES TO SIGN LEGISLATIVE, EXECUTIVE AND JUDICIAL BILL.

GOVERNMENT FUNDS TIED UP

No Provision for Continuance of Commerce Court and Because of Clause Relative to Government Clerks Leads Executive to Drastic Action.

Washington, Aug. 17.—The house failed to pass the legislative, executive and judicial appropriation bill over the veto of President Taft Thursday night by a vote of 153 to 107.

Because of its amendments to abolish the commerce court and limit the tenure of office of civil service employes to seven years, President Taft returned to the house Thursday with a veto message the legislative, executive and judicial appropriation bill. The cabinet read and approved the president's message earlier in the day.

One effect of Mr. Taft's veto of the bill is to hold up his own pay, that of every member of congress, every federal judge and every employe of the United States courts. Some leaders have proposed a plan of passing a resolution to extend all last year's appropriations to December 2 and adjourn congress without passing the bill.

Mr. Taft's message was strong in its condemnation of the way congress had attached special legislation to an annual appropriation bill. The president wrote that he approved any system of promoting efficiency in the civil service and favored a civil pension system, but could not approve legislation to turn out of office employes who had given their best years to the government. The president defended the commerce court vigorously and wrote that opposition to it came from those who had not been in sympathy with its decisions. He wrote:

"When it is thought wise by congress to include in general supply bills important substantive legislation and the executive cannot approve such legislation it is his constitutional duty to return the bill with his objections, and the responsibility for delay in the appropriation of the necessary expenses to run the government cannot rest upon the executive, but must be put where it belongs, upon the majority in each house of congress

"I am utterly opposed to the abolition of a court because its decisions may not always meet the approval of a majority. of the legislature. It is introducing a recall of the judiciary which in its way is quite as objectionable as the ordinary popular method proposed."

When the reading of the veto was finished Representative Stephens of Nebraska introduced a resolution for the passage of any vetoed measure by a majority vote. A two-thirds vote of both houses is now required. Mr. Stephens declared Mr. Taft had used the veto power more than it had been used in the first half-century of the nation's history. He added that the president of France had no veto power and that while the king of England enjoyed the privilege he "had not dared to use it" for 200 years.

An effort to reach an agreement to dispose of the steel and wool tariff revision bills already passed by the house over the president's veto failed in the senate. Unanimous consent to vote on both measures was opposed by Senator Briggs because there was a dispute about the arrangement of pairs.

Complete disagreement between the house and senate on the sugar tariff bills was outlined in a conference report on the measure presented to the senate by Senator Penrose. This indicates there will be no sugar legislation at this session.

ASTOR HEIR IS BORN

WIDOW OF TITANIC VICTIM IS MOTHER OF BOY.

Baby, Given Name of His Father, Is Direct Heir to Fortune of $3,000,000.

New York, Aug. 16.—Mrs. Madeline Force Astor, survivor of the Titanic disaster, in which her husband, the late Col. John Jacob Astor, lost his life last April, gave birth to a son at 8:15 a. m. on Wednesday.

The new arrival has been named John Jacob Astor after its father.

The baby becomes a direct heir to $3,000,000 of the Astor fortune.

The new Astor baby will be one of the few children ever born with a fortune as large as $3,000,000 in its own right. Colonel Astor had provided that, whether the child was a boy or girl, it should receive the same sum, and even if the stork brought more than one child, Colonel Astor's will also covered that contingency, as it read as follows:

"I bequeath such number of separate sums of $3,000,000 each as shall be equal to the number of my children who shall survive me other than my son, William Vincent Astor and my daughter, Ava Muriel Astor."

The latter children are by Colonel Astor's first wife, Mrs. Ava Willing Astor.

NINE ALDERMEN IN COURT

Preliminary Probe May Disclose Plans of Prosecution in Detroit Graft.

Detroit, Mich., Aug. 15.—On Tuesday nine aldermen were arraigned on bribery charges in police court. Assistant Prosecutor Josnowski intimated that a big conspiracy case was pending, in which others besides aldermen named would be involved, but announced that no conspiracy charges would be made at present.

Charges of promising to accept a bribe were preferred against Aldermen William Koenig, Richard M. Watson, Patrick O'Brien, William F. Zoeller, Stephen Skrayoki, William Hindle and Joseph Nerritt. Hearing was set for August 20, when the cases of nine others will be heard.

The case against Council Committee Secretary E. R. Schreiter, who confessed, was put over to await the conspiracy investigation.

It is alleged that nine of the aldermen actually received bribes, not, however, from a railroad official, but from a detective who posed as such. The nine others, it is charged, agreed to accept certain sums, but failed to "collect" at an appointed time.

Mother's Lingual Attainment.

The mother of a little boy in Kansas City, Kan., recites negro dialect stories charmingly. Her small son is quite proud of her accomplishment and frequently boasts of it. One day recently, when some of his playmates were vaunting the achievements of their several mothers, the little boy braggingly remarked:

"My mother is smarter than any of yours; she can talk two languages."

"What are they?" demanded his companions.

"White and colored."

Child's Fear of the Dark.

If mothers notice that the brains of their little ones conjure up uncanny sights and thoughts from the shadows of a room more or less dark, let the light burn brightly. To force a child to become accustomed to the darkness is a grave error, if its nervous system is so organized that this forcing is productive of a fright.

The nervous system of a child is a very susceptible organization and the deleterious impressions made upon it will often make their influence felt throughout its whole after life. If the child asks for a light under such circumstances do not refuse it.

Carrying It Too Far.

"Scientific management, like any other good thing, may be carried to excess."

The speaker was R. Marriott Thompson, the San Francisco scientific management expert. He continued, says the New York Tribune:

"We scientific managers mustn't go as far as Hussler went.

"Hussler was the proprietor of a tremendous factory where scientific management had reduced the motions of every hand from 800 to 17. Hussler attended a very fashionable wedding one day, a wedding where the ceremony was performed by a bishop assisted by a dean and a canon, and in the most impressive part of the writ, Hussler, overcome by his scientific management ideas, rushed up to the altar and pushed the bishop and canon rudely back.

"'Here, boys,' he said, 'one's quite enough for a little job like this.'"

Really Had Best of It.

John Burroughs is well known as one of the foremost nature writers in this country. Some time ago he visited his brother, Eden Burroughs, who lives in the Catskills, at a place called Hobert. The two brothers went for hunting together. The honor of the hunt came to Eden, who shot the only fox. So it happened that foxskins were worth five dollars at that time, and the successful Nimrod took much pride in telling how he got the better of the sage of Slabsides. Later, in boasting to a few friends about it in the presence of his brother John, he was interrupted by, "You have bragged about that fox hunt long enough. You shot the fox, sold the skin and got five dollars. I wrote a little account of the hunt, and got $75 from the magazine which published it. So there you are!"

SYNOPSIS.

Lieut. Harry Mallory is ordered to the Philippines. He and Marjorie Newton decide to elope, but wreck of taxicab prevents their seeing minister on the way to the train. Transcontinental train is taking on passengers. Porter has a lively time with an Englishman and Ira Lathrop, a Yankee business man. The elopers have an exciting time getting to the train. "Little Jimmie" Wellington, bound for Reno to get a divorce, boards train in maudlin condition. Later Mrs. Jimmie appears. She is also bound for Reno with same object. Likewise Mrs. Sammy Whitcomb. Latter blames Mrs. Jimmie for her marital troubles. Classmates of Mallory decorate bridal berth. Rev. and Mrs. Temple start on a vacation. They decide to cut loose and Temple removes evidence of his calling. Marjorie decides to let Mallory proceed alone, but train starts while they are lost in farewell. Passengers join Mallory's classmates in giving couple wedding hazing. Marjorie is distracted. Ira Lathrop, woman-hating bachelor, discovers an old sweetheart, Anne Gattle, a fellow passenger. Mallory vainly hunts for a preacher among the passengers. Mrs. Wellington hears Little Jimmie's voice. Later she meets Mrs. Whitcomb. Mallory reports to Marjorie his failure to find a preacher. They decide to pretend a quarrel and Mallory finds a vacant berth.

CHAPTER XV—(Continued).

And now he was sprawled and snoring majestically among his many luggages, like a sleeping lion. Revenge tasted good to the humble porter; it tasted like a candied yam smothered in 'possum gravy. He smacked his thick lips over this revenge. With all the insolence of a servant in brief authority, he gloated over his prey, and prodded him awake. Then murmured with hypocritical deference: "Excuse me, but could I see yo' ticket for yo' seat?"

"Certainly not! It's too much trouble," grumbled the half asleeper. "Confound you!"

The porter lured him on: "Is you she' you got one?"

Wedgewood was wide awake now, and surly as any Englishman before breakfast: "Of cawse I'm shaw. How dare you?"

"Too bad, but I'm 'bleeged to ask you to gimme a peek at it."

"This is an outrage!"

"Yassah, but I just nachelly got to see it."

Wedgewood gathered himself together, and ransacked his many pockets with increasing anger, muttering under his breath. At length he produced the ticket, and thrust it at the porter: "Thah, you idiot, are you convinced now?"

The porter gazed at the billet with ill-concealed triumph. "Yassah. I's convinced," Mr. Wedgewood settled back and closed his eyes. "I's convinced that you is in the wrong berth!"

"Impossible! I won't believe you!" the Englishman raged, getting to his feet in a fury.

"Perhaps you'll believe Mista Ticket," the porter chortled. "He says numba ten, and that's ten across the way and down the road a piece."

"This is outrageous! I decline to move."

"You may decline, but you move just the same," the porter said, reaching out for his various bags and caryalls. "The train moves and you move with it."

Wedgewood stood fast: "You had no right to put me in here in the first place."

The porter disdained to refute this slender. He stumbled down the aisle with the bundles. "It's too bad, it's sutt'nly too bad, but you sholy must come along."

Wedgewood followed, gesticulating violently.

"Here—wait—how dare you! And that berth is made up. I don't want to go to bed now!"

"Mista Ticket says, 'Go to baid!'"

"Of all the disgusting countries! Heah, don't put that thah—heah."

The porter flung his load anywhere, and absolved himself with a curt, "I's got otha passengers to wait on now."

"I shall certainly report you to the company," the Englishman fumed.

"Yassah, I p'sume so."

"Have I got to go to bed now? Really, I—" but the porter was gone, and the irate foreigner crawled under his curtains, muttering, "I shall write a letter to the London Times about this."

To add to his misery, Mrs. Whitcomb came from the Women's Room, and as she passed him, she prodded him with one sharp elbow and twisted the corner of her heel into his little toe. He thrust his head out with his fiercest, "How dare you!" But Mrs. Whitcomb was fresh from a prolonged encounter with Mrs. Wellington, and she flung back a venomous glare that sent the Englishman to cover.

The porter reveled in his victory till he had to dash out to the vestibule to give vent to hilarious yelps of laughter. When he had regained composure, he came back to Mallory and bent over him to say:

"Yo' berth is empty, sah. Shall I make it up?"

Mallory nodded, and turned to Marjorie, with a sad, "Good night, darling."

The porter rolled his eyes again, and turned away, only to be recalled by Marjorie's voice: "Porter, take this old handbag out of here."

The porter thought of the vanquished Lathrop, exiled to the smoking room, and he answered: "That belongs to the gemman what owns this berth."

"Put it in number one," Marjorie commanded, with a queenly gesture.

The porter obeyed meekly, wondering what would happen next. He had no sooner deposited Lathrop's valise among the incongruous white ribbons, than Marjorie recalled him to say: "And, porter, you may bring me my own baggage."

"Yo what—missus?"

"Our handbags, idiot," Mallory explained, peevishly.

"I ain't seen no handbags of you-alls," the porter protested. "You-all didn't have no handbags when you got on this cah."

Mallory jumped as if he had been shot. "Good Lord, I remember! We left 'em in the taxicab!"

The porter cast his hands up, and walked away from the tragedy. Marjorie stared at Mallory in horror.

"We had so little time to catch the train," Mallory stammered. Marjorie leaped to her feet: "I'm going up in the baggage car."

"For the dog?"

"For my trunk."

And now Mallory annihilated her completely, for he gasped: "Our trunks are on the train ahead!"

Marjorie fell back for one moment, then bounded to her feet with shrill commands: "Porter! Porter! I want you to stop this train this minute!"

The porter called back from the depths of a berth: "This train don't stop till tomorrow noon."

Marjorie had strength enough for only one vain protest: "Do you mean to say that I've got to go to San Francisco in this waist—a waist that has seen a whole day in Chicago?"

The best consolation Mallory could offer was companionship in misery. He pushed forward one not too immaculate cuff. "Well, this is the only linen I have."

"Don't speak to me," snapped Marjorie, beating her heels against the floor.

"But, my darling!"

"Go away and leave me. I hate you!"

Mallory rose up, and stumbling down the aisle, plounced into berth number three, an allegory of despair.

About this time, Little Jimmie Wellington, having completed more or less chaotic preparations for sleep, found that he had put on his pyjamas hindside foremost. After vain efforts to whirl round quickly and get at his own back, he put out a frowsy head, and called for help.

"Say, Porter, Porter!"

"I'm still on the train," answered the porter, coming into view.

"You'll have to hook me up."

The porter rendered what aid and correction he could in Wellington's hippopotamine toilet. Wellington was just wide enough awake to discern the undisturbed bridal-chamber. He whined:

"Say, porter, that rice-trap. Aren't they going to flop the rice-trap?"

The porter shook his head sadly. "Don't look like that flopper's a'goin to flip. That dog-on bridal couple is done divorced a'ready!"

CHAPTER XVI.

Good Night, All!

The car was settling gradually into peace. But there was still some murmur and drowsy energy. Shoes continued to drop, heads to bump against upper berths, the bell to ring now and then, and ring again and again.

The porter paid little heed to it; he was busy making up number five (Ira Lathrop's berth) for Marjorie, who was making what preparations she could for her trousseauless, husbandless, dogless first night out.

Finally the Englishman, who had almost rung the bell dry of electricity, shoved from his berth his indignant and undignified head. Once more the car resounded with the cry of "Pawtah! Pawtah!"

The porter moved up with noticeable deliberation. "Did you ring, sah?"

"Did I ring! Paw-tah, you may draw my tuh at eight-thutty in the mawning."

"Draw yo'—what, sah?" the porter gasped.

"My tuh."

"Ba-ath tuh?"

"Bahth tuh."

"Lawdy, man. Is you allowin' to take a ba-ath in tha mawnin'?"

"Of course I am."

"Didn't you have one befo' you stahted?"

"How dare you! Of cawse I did."

"Well, that's all you git."

"Do you mean to tell me that there is no tub on this beastly train?" Wedgewood almost fell out of bed with the shock of this news.

"We do not carry tubs—no, sah. There's a lot of tubs in San Francisco, though."

"No tub on this train for four days!" Wedgewood sighed. "But whatever does one do in the meanwhile?"

"One just waits. Yassah, one and all waits."

"It's ghahstly, that's what it is, ghahstly."

"Yassah," said the porter, and mumbled as he walked away, "but the weather is gettin' cooler."

He finished preparing Marjorie's bunk, and was just suggesting that Mallory retreat to the smoking room while number three was made up, when there was a commotion in the corridor, and a man in checked overalls dashed into the car.

His ear was slightly red, and he held at arm's length, as if it were a venomous monster, Snoozleums. And he yelled:

"Say, whose durn dog is this? He bit two men, and he makes so much noise we can't sleep in the baggage car."

Marjorie went flying down the aisle to reclaim her lost lamb in wolf's clothing, and Snoozleums, the returned prodigal, yelped and leaped, and told her all about the indignities he had been subjected to, and his valiant struggle for liberty.

Marjorie, seeing only Snoozleums, stepped into the fatal berth number one, and paid no heed to the dangling ribbons. Mallory, eager to restore himself to her love by loving her dog, crowded closer to her side, making a hypocritical ado over the pup.

Everybody was popping his or her face out to learn the cause of such clamor. Among the bodiless heads suspended along the curtains, like Dyak trophies, appeared the great mask of Little Jimmie Wellington. He had been unable to sleep for mourning the wanton waste of that lovely rice-trap.

When he peered forth, his eyes hardly believed themselves. The elusive bride and groom were actually in the trap—the hen pheasant and the chanticleer. But the net did not fall. He waited to see them sit down, and spring the infernal machine. But they would not sit.

In fact, Marjorie was muttering to Harry—tenderly, now, since he had won her back by his efforts to console Snoozleums—she was muttering tenderly:

"We must not be seen together, honey. Go away, I'll see you in the morning."

And Mallory was saying with bitterest resignation: "Good night—my friend."

And they were shaking hands! This incredible bridal couple was shaking hands with itself—disintegrating! Then Wellington determined to do at least his duty by the sacred rites.

The gaping passengers saw what was probably the largest pair of pajamas in Chicago. They saw Little Jimmie, smothering back his giggles like a schoolboy, tiptoe from his berth, enter the next berth, brushing the porter aside, climb on the seat, and clutch the ribbon that pulled the stopper from the trap.

Down upon the unsuspecting elopers came this miraculous cloudburst of ironical rice, and with it came Little Jimmie Wellington, who lost what little balance he had, and catapulted into their midst like the offspring of an iceberg.

It was at this moment that Mrs. Wellington, hearing the loud cries of the panic-stricken Marjorie, rushed from the Women's Room, absent-mindedly combing a totally detached section of her hair. She recognized familiar pyjamas waving in air, and with one faint gasp: "Jimmie! on this train!" she swooned away. She would have fallen, but seeing that no one paid any attention to her, she recovered consciousness on her own hook, and vanished into her berth, to meditate on the whys and wherefores of her husband's presence in this car.

Dr. Temple in a nightgown and trousers; Roger Ashton, in a collarless estate, and the porter, managed to extricate Mr. Wellington from his plight, and stow him away, though it was like putting a whale to bed.

Mallory, seeing that Marjorie had fled, vented his wild rage against fate in general, and rice traps in particular, by tearing the bridal bungalow to pieces, and then he stalked into the smoking room, where Ira Lathrop, homeless and dispossessed, was sound asleep, with his feet in the chair.

He was dreaming that he was a boy in Brattleboro, the worst boy in Brattleboro, trying to get up the courage to spark pretty Anne Gattle, and throwing rocks at the best boy in town, Charlie Selby, who was always at her side. The porter woke Ira, an hour later, and escorted him to the late bridal section.

Marjorie had fled with her dog, as soon as she could grope her way through the deluge of rice. She hopped into her berth, and spent an hour trying to clear her hair of the multitudinous grains. And as for Snoozleums, his thick wool was so be-riced that for two days, whenever he shook himself, he snew.

Discomfited Masher.

A gray-haired masher, easily over sixty years of age, was given a cold reception when he endeavored to become acquainted with the wife of a well-known newspaper man recently.

The day was cold and rainy. The newspaper man's wife was standing holding an open umbrella. She was waiting for her car. The gray-bearded individual unannounced stooped under her umbrella, and stood beside her for an instant before he remarked:

"You seem to be waiting for some one."

He was nearly taken off his feet when the woman with a quick reply said, "I think you are mistaken, Santa Claus."

The gray-bearded individual left suddenly.

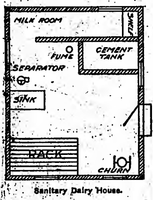
THE DAIRY

DAIRY HOUSE IS CONVENIENT

Walls and Floor of Sanitary Building Should Be of Reinforced Concrete—Cost Is Small.

Every dairyman selling milk to a creamery or cheese factory or city trade, or making dairy butter on his farm, should have a sanitary dairy-house. This building should be separate from the stable and other buildings on the farm and should be well supplied with water. Milk for any purpose must be kept in a clean, well-ventilated place.



Sanitary Dairy House.

Solid concrete dairy houses, such as are found on the large dairy farms, are to be recommended. A building 12 by 14 feet is large enough for a herd of twenty to twenty-five cows. The accompanying floor plan, from the Dairy Farmer, illustrates a very convenient farmers' dairy house. The size of the rooms may be varied to suit the individual needs.

A concrete tank near the pump makes cooling of the milk convenient. The separator should be located in the same room. A room provided with a sink and rack can be located at one end of the building. This room should be used exclusively for washing and drying cans and bottles. A room with shelves suitable for storing milk should be partitioned off from the opposite end of the building.

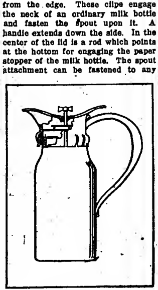
The walls and floor of the dairy house should be of solid reinforced concrete. The roof can be roofing paper or shingles.

The cost of such a building need not exceed $185, varying according to the size of the herd.

NOVEL MILK BOTTLE-PITCHER

Spout, Lid and Handle Attached in Ingenious Way and Will Be Found Quite Convenient.

Or call it a milk-pitcher-bottle, if you like—this device of an Ohio man. Whatever you call it you must admit its ingenuity. A spout and lid have a series of spring clips depending from the edge. These clips engage the neck of an ordinary milk bottle and fasten the spout upon it. A handle extends down the side. In the center of the lid is a rod which points at the bottom for engaging the paper stopper of the milk bottle. The spout attachment can be fastened to any milk bottle in a second. The little rod is thrust down into the stopper and given a twist to stick its fangs into the paper. The cover is then lifted off and, grasping the handle of the whole vessel, is used as a pitcher until it is empty, when the attachment can be removed and fastened to another bottle.



Milk Bottle-Pitcher.

Feeding Dairy Cows.

Fill the producing cows up on clover hay or alfalfa hay if you can get it instead of fodder or other coarse stuff containing low food values.

The sensible dairyman does not expect something for nothing, and a cow cannot give a full flow of milk on feeds that do not contain sufficient milk elements.

Oats, wheat, bran, oil meal and shorts should supplement the clover hay.

Feed some ground corn, but do not make it the sole concentrated ration.

Raising Dairy Heifer.

Raise the best heifer calves. The first six months or year's care of the calf determines largely the future usefulness of the cow. Here we can develop the tendency to take on fat and [illegible]

USE FOUND FOR BUTTERMILK

Utilization of Large Quantities of Hitherto Waste Product Causes Stir in Wisconsin.

In a recent bulletin from the Wisconsin experiment station the making of cheese from buttermilk is pretty fully described, says Hoard's Dairyman. This caused somewhat of a stir in the dairy world, and since it results in the utilization of large quantities of buttermilk wasted every year it is well worthy of consideration. It makes a very acceptable cheese sandwich, and the profit in the enterprise will depend entirely upon whether or not a steady market can be developed for it. Being a perishable product, very much like cottage cheese, it will keep only a few days. The fact of the matter is there is very little difference between buttermilk cheese and cottage cheese, except that the former has a buttermilk flavor.

Packing and selling this cheese requires special attention, since the public is not familiar with the product. It may be shipped in butter tubs and retailed in paper pails or other small packages. It will keep for a week or ten days at a temperature of 50 to 60 degrees, but it can be kept longer if the temperature is lowered to 32 degrees or below. It has been sold at three to five cents a pound at the factory and retailed at 7 to 12½ cents. If color is desired this may be secured by adding cheese coloring, the same as used in cheddar cheese.

The making of this buttermilk cheese is inexpensive, as the drainage racks, syphons, etc., can be constructed by almost anyone. When only a very small amount is desired the ordinary utensils of a creamery can be utilized.

MILK COOLER WITHOUT ICE

Evaporation of Water From Pan Will Keep Place Cool—Not Hard to Put Together.

To make a milk cooler like the one illustrated get four narrow pieces of plank four feet long for legs, and set these at any distance apart you wish, writes Dovie Whatley of Sealey, Tex., in the Missouri Valley Farmer. Next get three boards to use for shelves. Let the bottom shelf be larger than the second and the second larger than the first. Set a pan of water on the top shelf and drive a nail in each post on top. Put a thin cloth around the cooler so the end dips down into the water and fasten to the nails. The cloth will drink up the water from the pan and the evaporation will keep the inner space cool. Set the cooler in a tub to catch water as it soaks through.

DAIRY NOTES

A change of pasture is good for both cows and pasture.

Early morning is the time to make the best job of churning in hot weather.

Cows that are not kept in milk well up to calving time never attain their best.

The cow with a good appetite is a better producer than the one that is "finicky."

The only object of working is to distribute the salt evenly and compact the butter.

Wheat bran and linseed meal make the best combinations to give a freshening cow.

Harvest goes on the year around in the dairy business. Something to sell every day.

Cream should be churned at as low a temperature as possible and have the butter come in thirty minutes.

A large udder is not always to be trusted as a sure sign of a good milker. Better see the milk in the pail.

A good pasture lot near the barn where the cows may graze at night will keep up the milk flow during the hot months.

If native pasture does not supply enough grass it will pay well to put a succession of soiling crops in these lots or fields.

Regular careful milking permanently improves the animal as a milk producer, aside from directly increasing the milk flow.

It is well to fight shy of the dairy cow that is offered for sale cheap these days. At best she is probably good only for beef.

One way of keeping dirt, flies, etc., from dropping into the pail while milking is to cover the pail with clean cheesecloth and milk through it.

The next time a cow gives bloody milk give her a dose of Epsom salts, bathe her udder in warm water and rub with camphorated lard. This will often cure the trouble.

HARD FOR THE HOUSEWIFE

It's hard enough to keep house if in perfect health, but a woman who is weak, tired and suffering all of the time with an aching back has a heavy burden to carry. Any woman in this condition has good cause to suspect kidney trouble, especially if the kidney action seems disordered at all. Doan's Kidney Pills have cured thousands of women suffering in this way. It's the best-recommended special kidney remedy.

Moving Pictures Popular.

In a recent number of the Daily Consular Reports are collected memoranda from cities and towns in various distant parts of the world showing the universal quality of the popular interest which the moving pictures excite. England, Japan, Turkey, Mexico, India, Australia and the islands of the sea all have the same story to tell; wherever the cinematograph goes it finds an instant and sustained welcome.

Matter of Justice.

Where shall justice begin, with those who have power or with those who suffer wrong? If exact and ideal justice were done, the weak would make an effort to give to the strong all that is their due, and the strong would try to put their affairs in order so that no just cause of complaint should exist anywhere. The unhappy element in the relations of the strong and the weak is that both are thinking too much about exacting justice and not enough about doing that which is just and right. "Pay what thou owest" is the cry most often heard. "Give me that which is my due, then I will pay you what I owe."

One of the New York representatives in congress tells of a social function in an assembly district political club on the East side, whereat the chairman of the entertainment committee acted as master of ceremonies.

The chairman was very busy introducing the newly-arrived members of the club to the guests, who included a number of municipal officers. The representative mentioned was presented in a way to halve his official honors with his wife, as "The Honorable and Mrs. Congressman Blank." Next came a couple who were not known to the master of ceremonies, but, after receiving the correct name in a whisper, he announced:

"Mr. and Mrs. Inspector of Hydrants, Faucets and Shopworks Casey."—Lippincott's.

THE SUNBEAM.

BY W. G. HUNT.

Published every Friday, at Sunbeam, Pennington County, Minnesota.

The Detroit Record has taken the job of defeating Congressman Steenerson, and they have tackled a pretty big job.

The prospects now are that flax will be a lower price than usual this year, owing to the heavy crop. But if the flax millers run the prices down to low there is likely to be a big shortage next year, as the flax ground will be sown to wheat.

Knute Nelson has filed for re-election at last, setting at rest the many conjectures on the part of the politicians of the state, whether or not he has cause for worry is another proposition, but it is generally conceded that his toga will not be changed for a few years at least.—T.R.F. Times.

We are pleased to note that the northern Minnesota Editors are not running free plate to boom any candidates for office that is so liberally furnished by the plate houses. That is the proper way gentlemen, let the politicians know who they must deal with to get their send offs published.

The large plate houses seem to be having rather a poor market for their FREE political plate this year, as the country Ed tors are getting onto their job and do not propose to be made cats paws of to let the city professional writers hand out their paid for political write ups to them to be published free of charge. If Mr. Roosevelts committee Taft at all want to place their side of the political story before the farmers and country readers let them deal with the man behind the gun the Country Editor. Free plate Gah.

The votes for Taft will be about as scare as hens teeth up in this neck of the woods, and they should be. Any man living in eastern Pennington county that would walk up to the ballot box and put an X opposit the name of Taft for president, or Eberhart for governor is so ignorant of the situation that he had ought to be disfranchised and never allowed to vote again. He should be captured and placed in a cage and taken around for exhibition, and on one side of the cage have printed in large letters. "Here is a man who likes the government Engineers that Taft appointed at St. Paul to look after the interests of the lumber companies and let the people be damed." And on the other side of the cage have printed: "Here is a man that likes the Game and Fish Commission that Eberhart appointed, who certified last winter, as the tools of the lumber company that Red Lake River was open for the passage of fish from Thief River Falls to the outlet of Red Lake." Then haul the cage up in the town of Highlanding and get a good Socialist orator to get up on top of it and say: "Ladies and gentlemen! We have here the only living specimen of humanity that we could find, who voted for Taft and Eberhart; purchased at great cost. Take a good look at his head, and you will notice that it slants backwards and comes to peak on top. He indorses dishonesty in office and believes that to the victor belongs the spoils, particulary those collected from lumber companies for certifying that they had not closed off Red Lake River. He is the only specimen that we can finnd of this kind to stand up and take a good look at him."

M. A. Brattland, of Ada is the Socialist nominee for Congressman from this district. It would no doubt gratify the vanity of Mr. Bratland to be elected to this office so as to draw the salary, but it would be a mighty poor investment for the district at this time. In fact it would look to us like trading a well seasoned work horse for a two year old colt in the busy harvest season.

The race for governor of Minnesota is now on, and we believe that Sam Gordon is in the lead. Poor old Lee has joined the Taft Pot Gang that are billed for Salt River, while Teddy will go marching on. We like the independence of that man Gordon and if he is elected some of them appointed ducks will promptly have their heads dropped into the basket, among which will be Eberharts corporation pets, that game and fish Commission.

FOR COUNTY TREASURER.

I wish to announce that I am candidate for County Treasurer, subject to the ratification of the Republican voters at the primaries, September 17, 1912. Being that political parties have always regarded it as important to have their members elected to all offices, it must be for aid in promoting party politics, for so far as the work in the county offices is concerned, it can make no difference whatever, what the officer's political affiliations are, so the idea must be that he is expected to talk and work and use the advantage of his public position, in aiding the party to which he belongs. I believe that it is of the utmost importance to have the Republican party control at least one branch of congress in order to maintain the average of prices. While the price-level does not prove that times are good, theoretically, yet we know that with the enormous debt of the country, it will be harder to pay it with low prices than with high, steady prices. I believe that because one can not support the whole Republican ticket, it is no reason at all to quite supporting candidates for congress and the legislature, which is by far more important than the office of president, so far as party politics is concerned. These are my ideas, and I shall use my influence to help along on those lines, no matter whether I am nominated or not.

Sincerely for the success of the party.

Andrew Trovaton.

FOR SHERIFF.
